THE PREFACE.

THE history of this beautiful lady is to speak for itself; if it is not as beautiful as the lady herself is reported to be; if it is not as diverting as the reader can desire, and much more than he can reasonably expect, and if all the most diverting parts of it are not adapted to the instruction and improvement of the reader, the relator says it must be from the defect of his performance; dressing up the story in worse clothes than the lady whose words he speaks, prepared for the world.

He takes the liberty to say, that this story differs from most of the modern performances of this kind, though some of them have met with a very good reception in the world. I say, it differs from them in this great and essential article, namely, that the foundation of this is laid in truth of fact; and so the work is not a story, but a history.

The scene is laid so near the place where the main part of it was transacted, that it was necessary to conceal names and persons; lest what cannot be yet entirely forgot in that part of the town should be remembered, and the facts traced back too plainly by the many people yet living, who would know the persons by the particulars.

It is not always necessary that the names of persons should be discovered, though the history may be many ways useful; and if we should be always obliged to name the persons, or not to relate the story, the consequence might be only this:—that many a pleasant and delightful history would be buried in the dark, and the world deprived both of the pleasure and the profit of it.

The writer says he was particularly acquainted with this lady's first husband, the brewer, and with his father, and also with his bad circumstances; and knows that first part of the story to be truth.

This may, he hopes, be a pledge for the credit of the rest, though the latter part of her history lay abroad, and could not be so well vouched as the first; yet, as she has told it herself, we have the less reason to question the truth of that part also.

In the manner she has told the story, it is evident she does not insist upon her justification in any one part of it; much less does she recommend her conduct, or, indeed, any part of it, except her repentance, to our imitation. On the contrary, she makes frequent excursions, in a just censuring and condemning her own practice. How often does she reproach herself in the most passionate manner, and guide us to just reflections in the like cases!

It is true she met with unexpected success in all her wicked courses; but even in the highest elevations of her prosperity, she makes frequent acknowledgments, that the pleasure of her wickedness was not worth the repentance; and that all the satisfaction she had, all the joy in the view of her prosperity, no, nor all the wealth she rolled in, the gaiety of her appearance, the equipages and the honours she was attended with, could quiet her mind, abate the reproaches of her conscience, or procure her an hour's sleep, when just reflection kept her waking.

The noble inferences that are drawn from this one part are worth all the rest of the story, and abundantly justify, as they are the professed design of, the publication.

If there are any parts in her story, which, being obliged to relate a wicked action, seem to describe it too plainly, the writer says all imaginable care has been taken to keep clear of indecencies and immodest expressions; and it is hoped you will find nothing to prompt a vicious mind, but everywhere much to discourage and expose it.

Scenes of crime can scarce be represented in such a manner but some may make a criminal use of them; but when vice is painted in its low-prized colours, it is not to make people in love with it, but to expose it; and if the reader makes a wrong use of the figures, the wickedness is his own.

In the mean time, the advantages of the present work are so great, and the virtuous reader has room for so much improvement, that we make no question the story, however meanly told, will find a passage to his best hours, and be read both with profit and delight.

THE FORTUNATE MISTRESS;

OR,

---

I WAS born, as my friends told me, at the city of Poitiers, in the province or county of Poictou, in France, from whence I was brought to England by my parents, who fled for their religion about the year 1683, when the protestants were banished from France by the cruelty of their persecutors.

I, who knew little or nothing of what I was brought over hither for, was well enough pleased with being here. London, a large and gay city, took with me mighty well, who, from my being a child, loved a crowd, and to see a great many fine folks.

I retained nothing of France but the language, my father and mother being people of better fashion than ordinarily the people called refugees at that time were; and having fled early, while it was easy to secure their effects, had, before their coming over, remitted considerable sums of money, or, as I remember, a considerable value in French brandy, paper, and other goods; and these selling very much to advantage here, my father was in very good circumstances at his coming over, so that he was far from applying to the rest of our nation that were here for countenance and relief. On the contrary, he had his door continually thronged with miserable objects of the poor starving creatures who at that time fled hither for shelter on account of conscience, or something else.

I have, indeed, heard my father say that he was pestered with a great many of those who, for any religion they had, might e'en have stayed where they were, but who flocked over hither in droves, for what they call in English, a livelihood ; hearing with what open arms the refugees were received in England, and how they fell readily into business, being, by the charitable assistance of the people in London, encouraged to work in their manufactories in Spitalfields, Canterbury, and other places, and that they had a much better price for their work than in France, and the like.

of August 1683

My father, I say, told me that he was more pestered with the clamours of these people than of those who were truly refugees, and fled in distress merely for conscience.

I was about ten years old when I was brought over hither, where, as I have said, my father lived in very good circumstances, and died in about eleven years more ; in which time, as I had accomplished myself for the sociable part of the world, so I had acquainted myself with some of our English neighbours, as is the custom in London ; and as, while I was young, I had picked up three or four playfellows and companions suitable to my years, so, as we grew bigger, we learned to call one another intimates and friends ; and this forwarded very much the finishing me for conversation and the world.

I went to English schools, and being young, I learnt the English tongue perfectly well, with all the customs of the English young women ; so that I retained nothing of the French but the speech ; nor did I so much as keep any remains of the French language tagged to my way of speaking, as most foreigners do, but spoke what we call natural English, as if I had been born here.

Being to give my own character, I must be excused to give it as impartially as possible, and as if I was speaking of another body ; and the sequel will lead you to judge whether I flatter myself or no.

I was (speaking of myself at about fourteen years of age) tall, and very well made ; sharp as a hawk in matters of common knowledge ; quick and smart in discourse ; apt to be satirical ; full of repartee, and a little too forward in conversation ; or as we call it in English, bold, though perfectly modest in my behaviour. Being French born, I danced, as some say, naturally, loved it extremely, and sung well also, and so well that, as you will hear, it was afterwards some advantage to me. With all these things, I wanted neither wit, beauty, or money. In this manner I set out into the world, having all the advantages that any young woman could desire, to recommend me to others, and form a prospect of happy living to myself.

At about fifteen years of age my father gave me, as he called it in French, 25,000 livres, that is to say, two thousand pounds portion, and married me to an eminent brewer in the city. Pardon me if I conceal his name, for though he was the foundation of my ruin, I cannot take so severe a revenge upon him.

With this thing called a husband I lived eight years in good fashion, and for some part of the time kept a coach, that is to say, a kind of mock coach; for all the week the horses were kept at work in the dray-carts, but on Sunday I had the privilege to go abroad in my chariot, either to church or otherways, as my husband and I could agree about it, which, by the way, was not very often; but of that hereafter.

Before I proceed in the history of the married part of my life, you must allow me to give as impartial an account of my husband as I have done of myself. He was a jolly, handsome fellow as any woman need wish for a companion; tall and well made; rather a little too large, but not so as to be ungentle; he danced well, which I think was the first thing that brought us together. He had an old father who managed the business carefully, so that he had little of that part lay on him, but now and then to appear and show himself; and he took the advantage of it, for he troubled himself very little about it, but went abroad, kept company, hunted much, and loved it exceedingly.

After I have told you that he was a handsome man and a good sportsman, I have indeed said all; and unhappy was I, like other young people of our sex, I chose him for being a handsome jolly fellow, as I have said; for he was otherwise a weak, empty-headed, untaught creature, as any woman could ever desire to be coupled with. And here I must take the liberty, whatever I have to reproach myself with in my after conduct, to turn to my fellow-creatures, the young ladies of this country, and speak to them by way of precaution. If you have any regard to your future happiness; any view of living comfortably with a husband; any hope of preserving your fortunes, or restoring them after any disaster, never, ladies, marry a fool; any husband rather than a fool; with some other husbands you may be unhappy, but with a fool you will be miserable; with another husband you may, I say, be unhappy, but with a fool you must ; nay, if he would, he cannot make you easy ; everything he does is so awkward, everything he says is so empty, a woman of any sense cannot but be surfeited and sick of him twenty times a day. What is more shocking than for a woman to bring a handsome, comely fellow of a husband into company, and then be obliged to blush for him every time she hears him speak ? To hear other gentlemen talk sense, and he able to say nothing ? And so look like a fool, or which is worse, hear him talk nonsense, and be laughed at for a fool.

In the next place, there are so many sorts of fools, such an infinite variety of fools, and so hard it is to know the worst of the kind, that I am obliged to say, No fool, ladies, at all, no kind of fool, whether a mad fool or a sober fool, a wise fool or a silly fool ; take anything but a fool ; nay, be anything, be even an old maid, the worst of nature's curses, rather than take up with a fool.

But to leave this awhile, for I shall have occasion to speak of it again ; my case was particularly hard, for I had a variety of foolish things complicated in this unhappy match.

First, and which I must confess is very unsufferable, he was a conceited fool, tout opiniatre ; everything he said was right, was best, and was to the purpose, whoever was in company, and whatever was advanced by others, though with the greatest modesty imaginable ; and yet when he came to defend what he had said by argument and reason, he would do it so weakly, so emptily, and so nothing to the purpose, that it was enough to make anybody that heard him sick and ashamed of him.

Secondly, he was positive and obstinate, and the most positive in the most simple and inconsistent things, such as were intolerable to bear.

These two articles, if there had been no more, qualified him to be a most unbearable creature for a husband ; and so it may be supposed, at first sight, what a kind of life I led with him. However, I did as well as I could, and held my tongue, which was the only victory I gained over him ; for when he would talk after his own empty rattling way with me, and I would not answer, or enter into discourse with him on the point he was upon, he would rise up in the greatest passion imaginable, and go away, which was the cheapest way I had to be delivered.

I could enlarge here much upon the method I took to make my life passable and easy with the most incorrigible temper in the world ; but it is too long, and the articles too trifling : I shall mention some of them as the circumstances I am to relate shall necessarily bring them in.

After I had been married about four years, my own father died, my mother having been dead before. He liked my match so ill, and saw so little room to be satisfied with the conduct of my husband, that though he left me five thousand livres, and more, at his death, yet he left it in the hands of my elder brother, who, running on too rashly in his adventures as a merchant, failed, and lost not only what he had, but what he had for me too, as you shall hear presently.

Thus I lost the last gift of my father's bounty by having a husband not fit to be trusted with it : there's one of the benefits of marrying a fool.

Within two years after my own father's death, my husband's father also died ; and, as I thought, left him a considerable addition to his estate, the whole trade of the brewhouse, which was a very good one, being now his own.

But this addition to his stock was his ruin, for he had no genius to business ; he had no knowledge of his accounts ; he bustled a little about it, indeed, at first, and put on a face of business, but he soon grew slack ; it was below him to inspect his books, he committed all that to his clerks and book-keepers ; and while he found money in cash to pay the malt-man and the excise, and put some in his pocket, he was perfectly easy and indolent, let the main chance go how it would.

I foresaw the consequence of this, and attempted several times to persuade him to apply himself to his business ; I put him in mind how his customers complained of the neglect of his servants on one hand, and how abundance broke in his debt, on the other hand, for want of the clerk's care to secure him, and the like ; but he thrust me by, either with hard words, or fraudulently, with representing the cases otherwise than they were.

However, to cut short a dull story, which ought not to be long, he began to find his trade sunk, his stock declined, and that, in short, he could not carry on his business, and once or twice his brewing utensils were extented for the excise ; and, the last time, he was put to great extremities to clear them.

This alarmed him, and he resolved to lay down his trade ; which, indeed, I was not sorry for ; foreseeing that if he did not lay it down in time, he would be forced to do it another way, namely, as a bankrupt. Also I was willing he should draw out while he had something left, lest I should come to be stripped at home, and be turned out of doors with my children ; for I had now five children by him, the only work (perhaps) that fools are good for.

I thought myself happy when he got another man to take his brewhouse clear off his hands ; for, paying down a large sum of money, my husband found himself a clear man, all his debts paid, and with between two and three thousand pounds in his pocket ; and being now obliged to remove from the brewhouse, we took a house at ———, a village about two miles out of town ; and happy I thought myself, all things considered, that I was got off clear, upon so good terms ; and had my handsome fellow had but one capful of wit, I had been still well enough.

I proposed to him either to buy some place with the money, or with part of it, and offered to join my part to it, which was then in being, and might have been secured ; so we might have lived tolerably, at least during his life. But as it is the part of a fool to be void of counsel, so he neglected it, lived on as he did before, kept his horses and men, rid every day out to the forest a hunting, and nothing was done all this while ; but the money decreased apace, and I thought I saw my ruin hastening on, without any possible way to prevent it.

I was not wanting with all that persuasions and entreaties could perform, but it was all fruitless ; representing to him how fast our money wasted, and what would be our condition when it was gone, made no impression on him ; but like one stupid, he went on, not valuing all that tears and lamentations could be supposed to do ; nor did he abate his figure or equipage, his horses or servants, even to the last, till he had not a hundred pounds left in the whole world.

It was not above three years that all the ready money was thus spending off ; yet he spent it, as I may say, foolishly too, for he kept no valuable company neither, but generally with huntsmen and horse-courers, and men meaner than himself, which is another consequence of a man's being a fool ; such can never take delight in men more wise and capable than themselves, and that makes them converse with scoundrels, drink belch with porters, and keep company always below themselves.

This was my wretched condition, when one morning my husband told me he was sensible he was come to a miserable condition, and he would go and seek his fortune somewhere or other. He had said something to that purpose several times before that, upon my pressing him to consider his circumstances, and the circumstances of his family, before it should be too late; but as I found he had no meaning in anything of that kind, as, indeed, he had not much in anything he ever said, so I thought they were but words of course now. When he had said he would be gone, I used to wish secretly, and even say in my thoughts, I wish you would, for if you go on thus, you will starve us all.

He stayed, however, at home all that day, and lay at home that night; early the next morning he gets out of bed, goes to a window which looked out towards the stables, and sounds his French horn, as he called it, which was his usual signal to call his men to go out a hunting.

It was about the latter end of August, and so was light yet at five o'clock, and it was about that time that I heard him and his two men go out and shut the yard gates after them. He said nothing to me more than as usual when he used to go out upon his sport; neither did I rise, or say anything to him that was material, but went to sleep again after he was gone, for two hours or thereabouts.

It must be a little surprising to the reader to tell him at once, that after this, I never saw my husband more; but to go farther, I not only never saw him more, but I never heard from him, or of him, neither of any or either of his two servants, or of the horses, either what became of them, where or which way they went, or what they did, or intended to do, no more than if the ground had opened and swallowed them all up, and nobody had known it, except as hereafter.

I was not, for the first night or two, at all surprised, no, nor very much the first week or two, believing that if anything evil had befallen them, I should soon enough have heard of that; and also knowing, that as he had two servants and three horses with him, it would be the strangest thing in the world that anything could befall them all but that I must some time or other hear of them.

But you will easily allow, that as time run on, a week, two weeks, a month, two months, and so on, I was dreadfully frightened at last, and the more when I looked into my own circumstances, and considered the condition in which I was left, with five children, and not one farthing subsistence for them, other than about seventy pounds in money, and what few things of value I had about me, which, though considerable in themselves, were yet nothing to feed a family, and for a length of time too.

What to do I knew not, nor to whom to have recourse; to keep in the house where I was, I could not, the rent being too great; and to leave it without his orders, if my husband should return, I could not think of that neither; so that I continued extremely perplexed, melancholy, and discouraged to the last degree.

I remained in this dejected condition near a twelvemonth. My husband had two sisters, who were married, and lived very well, and some other near relations that I knew of, and I hoped would do something for me; and I frequently sent to these, to know if they could give me any account of my vagrant creature; but they all declared to me in answer, that they knew nothing about him; and after frequent sending, began to think me troublesome, and to let me know they thought so too, by their treating my maid with very slight and unhandsome returns to her inquiries.

This grated hard, and added to my affliction, but I had no recourse but to my tears, for I had not a friend of my own left me in the world. I should have observed, that it was about half a year before this elopement of my husband, that the disaster I mentioned above befel my brother, who broke, and that in such bad circumstances, that I had the mortification to hear, not only that he was in prison, but that there would be little or nothing to be had by way of composition.

Misfortunes seldom come alone: this was the forerunner of my husband's flight; and as my expectations were cut off on that side, my husband gone, and my family of children on my hands, and nothing to subsist them, my condition was the most deplorable that words can express.

I had some plate and some jewels, as might be supposed, my fortune and former circumstances considered; and my husband, who had never stayed to be distressed, had not been put to the necessity of rifling me, as husbands usually do in such cases. But as I had seen an end of all the ready money during the long time I had lived in a state of expectation for my husband, so I began to make away one thing after another, till those few things of value which I had began to lessen apace, and I saw nothing but misery and the utmost distress before me, even to have my children starve before my face. I leave any one that is a mother of children, and has lived in plenty and good fashion, to consider and reflect what must be my condition. As to my husband, I had now no hope or expectation of seeing him any more; and indeed, if I had, he was the man, of all the men in the world, the least able to help me, or to have turned his hand to the gaining one shilling towards lessening our distress; he neither had the capacity or the inclination; he could have been no clerk, for he scarce wrote a legible hand; he was so far from being able to write sense, that he could not make sense of what others wrote; he was so far from understanding good English, that he could not spell good English; to be out of all business was his delight, and he would stand leaning against a post for half an hour together, with a pipe in his mouth, with all the tranquillity in the world, smoking, like Dryden's countryman, that whistled as he went for want of thought, and this even when his family was, as it were, starving, that little he had wasting, and that we were all bleeding to death; he not knowing, and as little considering, where to get another shilling when the last was spent.

This being his temper, and the extent of his capacity, I confess I did not see so much loss in his parting with me as at first I thought I did; though it was hard and cruel to the last degree in him, not giving me the least notice of his design; and indeed that which I was most astonished at was, that seeing he must certainly have intended this excursion some few moments at least before he put it in practice, yet he did not come and take what little stock of money we had left, or at least a share of it, to bear his expense for a little while, but he did not; and I am morally certain he had not five guineas with him in the world when he went away. All that I could come to the knowledge of about him was, that he left his hunting-horn, which he called the French horn, in the stable, and his hunting-saddle, went away in a handsome furniture, as they call it, which he used sometimes to travel with, having an embroidered housing, a case of pistols, and other things belonging to them; and one of his servants had another saddle with pistols, though plain, and the other a long gun, so that they did not go out as sportsmen, but rather as travellers; what part of the world they went to I never heard for many years.

As I have said, I sent to his relations, but they sent me short and surly answers; nor did any one of them offer to come to see me, or to see the children, or so much as to inquire after them, well perceiving that I was in a condition that was likely to be soon troublesome to them; but it was no time now to dally with them, or with the world; I left off sending to them, and went myself among them, laid my circumstances open to them, told them my whole case, and the condition I was reduced to, begged they would advise me what course to take, laid myself as low as they could desire, and entreated them to consider that I was not in a condition to help myself, and that without some assistance we must all inevitably perish. I told them, that if I had had but one child, or two children, I would have done my endeavour to have worked for them with my needle, and should only have come to them to beg them to help me to some work, that I might get our bread by my labour; but to think of one single woman, not bred to work, and at a loss where to get employment, to get the bread of five children, that was not possible, some of my children being young too, and none of them big enough to help one another.

It was all one; I received not one farthing of assistance from anybody, was hardly asked to sit down at the two sisters' houses, nor offered to eat or drink at two more near relations. The fifth, an ancient gentlewoman, aunt-in-law to my husband, a widow, and the least able also of any of the rest, did, indeed, ask me to sit down, gave me a dinner, and refreshed me with a kinder treatment than any of the rest, but added the melancholy part, viz., that she would have helped me, but that indeed, she was not able, which, however, I was satisfied was very true.

Here I relieved myself with the constant assistant of the afflicted, I mean tears, for, relating to her how I was received by the other of my husband's relations, it made me burst into tears, and I cried vehemently for a great while together, till I made the good old gentlewoman cry too several times.

However, I came home from them all without any relief, and went on at home till I was reduced to such inexpressible distress that it is not to be described. I had been several times after this at the old aunt's, for I prevailed with her to promise me to go and talk with the other relations, at least, that, if possible, she could bring some of them to take off the children, or to contribute something towards their maintenance; and to do her justice, she did use her endeavour with them, but all was to no purpose, they would do nothing, at least that way. I think, with much entreaty, she obtained, by a kind of collection among them all, about eleven or twelve shillings in money, which though it was a present comfort, was yet not to be named as capable to deliver me from any part of the load that lay upon me.

There was a poor woman that had been a kind of a dependent upon our family, and who I had often, among the rest of the relations, been very kind to; my maid put it into my head one morning to send to this poor woman, and to see whether she might not be able to help in this dreadful case.

I must remember it here, to the praise of this poor girl, my maid, that though I was not able to give her any wages, and had told her so, nay, I was not able to pay her the wages that I was in arrears to her, yet she would not leave me; nay, and as long as she had any money, when I had none, she would help me out of her own, for which, though I acknowledged her kindness and fidelity, yet it was but a bad coin that she was paid in at last, as will appear in its place.

Amy (for that was her name) put it into my thoughts to send for this poor woman to come to me, for I was now in great distress, and I resolved to do so; but just the very morning that I intended it, the old aunt, with the poor woman in her company, came to see me; the good old gentlewoman was, it seems, heartily concerned for me, and had been talking again among those people, to see what she could do for me, but to very little purpose.

You shall judge a little of my present distress by the posture

she found me in: I had five little children, the eldest was under ten years old, and I had not one shilling in the house to buy them victuals, but had sent Amy out with a silver spoon to sell it, and bring home something from the butcher's; and I was in a parlour, sitting on the ground, with a great heap of old rags, linen, and other things about me, looking them over, to see if I had anything among them that would sell or pawn for a little money, and had been crying ready to burst myself, to think what I should do next.

At this juncture, they knocked at the door; I thought it had been Amy, so I did not rise up, but one of the children opened the door, and they came directly into the room where I was, and where they found me in that posture, and crying vehemently, as above. I was surprised at their coming, you may be sure, especially seeing the person I had but just before resolved to send for; but when they saw me, how I looked, for my eyes were swelled with crying, and what a condition I was in as to the house, and the heaps of things that were about me, and especially when I told them what I was doing, and on what occasion, they sat down, like Job's three comforters, and said not one word to me for a great while, but both of them cried as fast and as heartily as I did.

The truth was, there was no need of much discourse in the case, the thing spoke itself, they saw me in rags and dirt, who was but a little before riding in my coach; thin, and looking almost like one starved, who was before fat and beautiful. The house, that was before handsomely furnished with pictures and ornaments, cabinets, pier-glasses, and everything suitable, was now stripped and naked, most of the goods having been seized by the landlord for rent, or sold to buy necessaries; in a word, all was misery and distress, the face of ruin was everywhere to be seen; we had eaten up almost everything, and little remained, unless, like one of the pitiful women of Jerusalem, I should eat up my very children themselves.

After these two good creatures had sat, as I say, in silence some time, and had then looked about them, my maid Amy came in, and brought with her a small breast of mutton and two great bunches of turnips, which she intended to stew for our dinner. As for me, my heart was so overwhelmed at seeing these two friends, for such they were, though poor, and at their seeing me in such a condition, that I fell into another violent fit of crying, so that in short I could not speak to them again for a great while longer.

During my being in such an agony, they went to my maid Amy at another part of the same room, and talked with her. Amy told them all my circumstances, and set them forth in such moving terms, and so to the life, that I could not upon any terms have done it like her myself, and, in a word, affected them both with it in such a manner, that the old aunt came to me, and though hardly able to speak for tears, Look ye, cousin, said she, in a few words; things must not stand thus, some course must be taken, and that forthwith; pray where were these children born? I told her the parish where we lived before, that four of them were born there, and one in the house where I now was, where the landlord, after having seized my goods for the rent past, not then knowing my circumstances, had now given me leave to live for a whole year more without any rent, being moved with compassion; but that this year was now almost expired.

Upon hearing this account, they came to this resolution, that the children should be all carried by them to the door of one of the relations mentioned above, and be set down there by the maid Amy, and that I, the mother, should remove for some days, shut up the doors, and be gone: that the people should be told, that if they did not think fit to take some care of the children, they might send for the churchwardens, if they thought that better, for that they were born in that parish, and there they must be provided for; as for the other child, which was born in the parish of —, that was already taken care of by the parish officers there, for indeed they were so sensible of the distress of the family that they had at first word done what was their part to do.

This was what these good women proposed, and bade me leave the rest to them. I was at first sadly afflicted at the thoughts of parting with my children, and especially at that terrible thing, their being taken into the parish keeping; and then a hundred terrible things came into my thoughts, viz., of parish children being starved at nurse; of their being ruined, let grow crooked, lamed, and the like, for want of being taken care of; and this sunk my very heart within me.

But the misery of my own circumstances hardened my heart against my own flesh and blood ; and when I considered they must inevitably be starved, and I too, if I continued to keep them about me, I began to be reconciled to parting with them all, any how, and any where, that I might be freed from the dreadful necessity of seeing them all perish, and perishing with them myself ; so I agreed to go away out of the house, and leave the management of the whole matter to my maid Amy and to them, and accordingly I did so ; and the same afternoon they carried them all away to one of their aunts.

Amy, a resolute girl, knocked at the door, with the children all with her, and bade the eldest, as soon as the door was open, run in, and the rest after her. She set them all down at the door before she knocked, and when she knocked she stayed till a maid-servant came to the door ; Sweetheart, said she, pray go in and tell your mistress here are her little cousins come to see her from —, naming the town where we lived, at which the maid offered to go back. Here, child, says Amy, take one of 'em in your hand, and I'll bring the rest ; so she gives her the least, and the wench goes in mighty innocently, with the little one in her hand, upon which Amy turns the rest in after her, shuts the door softly, and marches off as fast as she could.

Just in the interval of this, and even while the maid and her mistress were quarrelling (for the mistress raved and scolded at her like a mad woman, and had ordered her to go and stop the maid Amy, and turn all the children out of the doors again ; but she had been at the door, and Amy was gone, and the wench was out of her wits, and the mistress too), I say, just at this juncture, came the poor old woman, not the aunt, but the other of the two that had been with me, and knocks at the door ; the aunt did not go, because she had pretended to advocate for me, and they would have suspected her of some contrivance ; but as for the other woman, they did not so much as know that she had kept up any correspondence with me.

Amy and she had concerted this between them, and it was well enough contrived that they did so. When she came into the house, the mistress was fuming and raging like one distracted, and called the maid all the foolish jades and sluts that she could think of, and that she would take the children and turn them all out into the streets. The good poor woman, seeing her in such a passion, turned about as if she would be gone again, and said, Madam, I'll come again another time, I see you are engaged. No, no, Mrs. ——— says the mistress, I am not much engaged, sit down; this senseless creature here has brought in my fool of a brother's whole house of children upon me, and tells me, that a wench brought them to the door, and thrust them in, and bade her carry them to me; but it shall be no disturbance to me, for I have ordered them to be set in the street without the door, and so let the churchwardens take care of them, or else make this dull jade carry 'em back to ——— again, and let her that brought them into the world look after them if she will; what does she send her brats to me for?

The last indeed had been the best of the two, says the poor woman, if it had been to be done; and that brings me to tell you my errand, and the occasion of my coming, for I came on purpose about this very business, and to have prevented this being put upon you, if I could, but I see I am come too late.

How do you mean too late? says the mistress; what! have you been concerned in this affair then? what! have you helped bring this family slur upon us? I hope you do not think such a thing of me, madam, says the poor woman, but I went this morning to ———, to see my old mistress and benefactor, for she had been very kind to me, and when I came to the door, I found all fast locked and bolted, and the house looking as if nobody was at home.

I knocked at the door, but nobody came, till at last some of the neighbours' servants called to me, and said, There's nobody lives there, mistress; what do you knock for? I seemed surprised at that. What, nobody lives there! said I; what d'ye mean? does not Mrs. ——— live there? The answer was, No, she is gone; at which I parleyed with one of them, and asked her what was the matter. Matter! says she, why, it is matter enough: the poor gentlewoman has lived there all alone, and without anything to subsist her a long time, and this morning the landlord turned her out of doors.

Out of doors! says I; what! with all her children? Poor lambs, what is become of them? Why, truly, nothing worse, said they, can come to them than staying here, for they were almost starved with hunger; so the neighbours, seeing the poor lady in such distress, for she stood crying and wringing her hands over her children like one distracted, sent for the churchwardens to take care of the children; and they, when they came, took the youngest, which was born in this parish, and have got it a very good nurse, and taken care of it; but as for the other four, they had sent them away to some of their father's relations, and who were very substantial people, and who, besides that, lived in the parish where they were born.

I was not so surprised at this as not presently to foresee that this trouble would be brought upon you, or upon Mr. —; so I came immediately to bring you word of it, that you might be prepared for it, and might not be surprised, but I see they have been too nimble for me, so that I know not what to advise. The poor woman, it seems, is turned out of doors into the street; and another of the neighbours there told me, that when they took her children from her, she swooned away, and when they recovered her out of that, she run distracted, and is put into a madhouse by the parish, for there is nobody else to take any care of her.

This was all acted to the life by this good, kind, poor creature; for though her design was perfectly good and charitable, yet there was not one word of it true in fact: for I was not turned out of doors by the landlord, nor gone distracted. It was true, indeed, that at parting with my poor children I fainted, and was like one mad when I came to myself and found they were gone; but I remained in the house a good while after that, as you shall hear.

While the poor woman was telling this dismal story, in came the gentlewoman's husband, and though her heart was hardened against all pity, who was really and nearly related to the children, for they were the children of her own brother, yet the good man was quite softened with the dismal relation of the circumstances of the family; and when the poor woman had done, he said to his wife, This is a dismal case, my dear, indeed, and something must be done. His wife fell a raving at him: What, says she, do you want to have four children to keep? Have we not children of our own? Would you have these brats come and eat up my children's bread? No, no, let 'em go to the parish, and let them take care of them; I'll take care of my own.

Come, come, my dear, says the husband, charity is a duty to the poor, and he that gives to the poor lends to the Lord ; let us lend our heavenly Father a little of our children's bread, as you call it ; it will be a store well laid up for them, and will be the best security that our children shall never come to want charity, or be turned out of doors, as these poor innocent creatures are. Don't tell me of security, says the wife, 'tis a good security for our children to keep what we have together, and provide for them, and then 'tis time enough to help keep other folks children. Charity begins at home.

Well, my dear, says he again, I only talk of putting out a little money to interest : our Maker is a good borrower : never fear making a bad debt there, child ; I'll be bound for it. } husband

Don't banter me with your charity, and your allegories, says the wife, angrily ; I tell you they are my relations, not yours, and they shall not roost here ; they shall go to the parish.

All your relations are my relations now, says the good gentleman very calmly, and I won't see your relations in distress, and not pity them, any more than I would my own ; indeed, my dear, they shan't go to the parish. I assure you, none of my wife's relations shall come to the parish, if I can help it.

What ! will you take four children to keep ? says the wife.

No, no, my dear, says he, there's your sister —, I'll go and talk with her ; and your uncle —, I'll send for him and the rest. I'll warrant you, when we are all together, we will find ways and means to keep four poor little creatures from beggary and starving, or else it would be very hard ; we are none of us in so bad circumstances, but we are able to spare a mite for the fatherless. Don't shut up your bowels of compassion against your own flesh and blood. Could you hear these poor innocent children cry at your door for hunger, and give them no bread. } like Prithee, what need they cry at our door ? says she ; 'tis the business of the parish to provide for them ; they shan't cry at our door. If they do, I'll give them nothing. Won't you ? says he ; but I will. Remember that dreadful Scripture is directly against us, Prov. xxi. 13, Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard.

Well, well, says she, you must do what you will, because you pretend to be master : but if I had my will, I would send them where they ought to be sent. I would send them from whence they came.

Then the poor woman put in, and said, But, madam, that is sending them to starve, indeed, for the parish has no obligation to take care of 'em, and so they will lie and perish in the street.

Or be sent back again, says the husband, to our parish in a cripple-cart, by the justice's warrant, and so expose us and all the relations to the last degree among our neighbours, and among those who know the good old gentleman their grandfather, who lived and flourished in this parish so many years, and was so well beloved among all people, and deserved it so well.

I don't value that one farthing, not I, says the wife ; I'll keep none of them.

Well, my dear, says her husband, but I value it, for I won't have such a blot lie upon the family, and upon your children ; he was a worthy, ancient, and good man, and his name is respected among all his neighbours ; it will be a reproach to you, that are his daughter, and to our children, that are his grandchildren, that we should let your brother's children perish, or come to be a charge to the public, in the very place where your family once flourished. Come, say no more : I will see what can be done.

Upon this, he sends and gathers all the relations together at a tavern hard by, and sent for the four little children, that they might see them ; and they all, at first word, agreed to have them taken care of ; and, because his wife was so furious that she would not suffer one of them to be kept at home, they agreed to keep them all together for awhile ; so they committed them to the poor woman that had managed the affair for them, and entered into obligations to one another to supply the needful sums for their maintenance ; and, not to have one separated from the rest, they sent for the youngest from the parish where it was taken in, and had them all brought up together.

It would take up too long a part of this story to give a particular account with what a charitable tenderness this good person, who was but an uncle-in-law to them, managed that affair ; how careful he was of them ; went constantly to see them, and to see that they were well provided for, clothed, put to school, and, at last, put out in the world for their advantage; but 'tis enough to say he acted more like a father to them than an uncle-in-law, though all along much against his wife's consent, who was of a disposition not so tender and compassionate as her husband.

You may believe I heard this with the same pleasure which I now feel at the relating it again; for I was terribly affrighted at the apprehensions of my children being brought to misery and distress, as those must be who have no friends, but are left to parish benevolence.

I was now, however, entering on a new scene of life. I had a great house upon my hands, and some furniture left in it, but I was no more able to maintain myself and my maid Amy in it, than I was my five children; nor had I anything to subsist with but what I might get by working, and that was not a town where much work was to be had.

My landlord had been very kind indeed, after he came to know my circumstances, though, before he was acquainted with that part, he had gone so far as to seize my goods, and to carry some of them off too.

But I had lived three quarters of a year in his house after that, and had paid him no rent, and which was worse, I was in no condition to pay him any. However, I observed he came oftener to see me, looked kinder upon me, and spoke more friendly to me than he used to do; particularly the last two or three times he had been there, he observed, he said, how poorly I lived, how low I was reduced, and the like; told me it grieved him for my sake; and the last time of all he was kinder still, told me he came to dine with me, and that I should give him leave to treat me: so he called my maid Amy, and sent her out to buy a joint of meat; he told her what she should buy; but naming two or three things, either of which she might take, the maid, a cunning wench, and faithful to me as the skin to my back, did not buy anything outright, but brought the butcher along with her, with both the things that she had chosen, for him to please himself. The one was a large, very good leg of veal; the other a piece of the fore-ribs of roasting beef. He looked at them, but bade me chaffer with the butcher for him, and I did so, and came back to him and told him what the butcher had demanded for either of them, and what each of them came to. So he pulls out eleven shillings and threepence, which they came to together, and bade me take them both; the rest, he said, would serve another time.

I was surprised, you may be sure, at the bounty of a man that had but a little while ago been my terror, and had torn the goods out of my house like a fury: but I considered that my distresses had mollified his temper, and that he had afterwards been so compassionate as to give me leave to live rent free in the house a whole year.

But now he put on the face, not of a man of compassion only, but of a man of friendship and kindness, and this was so unexpected that it was surprising. We chatted together, and were, as I may call it, cheerful, which was more than I could say I had been for three years before; he sent for wine and beer too, for I had none; poor Amy and I had drank nothing but water for many weeks, and indeed, I have often wondered at the faithful temper of the poor girl, for which I but ill requited her at last.

When Amy was come with the wine, he made her fill a glass to him, and with the glass in his hand, he came to me and kissed me, which I was, I confess, a little surprised at, but more at what followed; for he told me, that as the sad condition which I was reduced to had made him pity me, so my conduct in it, and the courage I bore it with, had given him a more than ordinary respect for me, and made him very thoughtful for my good; that he was resolved for the present to do something to relieve me, and to employ his thoughts in the mean time, to see if he could, for the future, put me into a way to support myself.

While he found me change colour, and look surprised at his discourse, for so I did to be sure, he turns to my maid Amy, and looking at her, he says to me, I say all this madam, before your maid, because both she and you shall know that I have no ill design, and that I have, in mere kindness, resolved to do something for you, if I can; and as I have been a witness of the uncommon honesty and fidelity of Mrs. Amy, here to you in all your distresses, I know she may be trusted with so honest a design as mine is; for I assure you, I bear a proportioned regard to your maid too, for her affection to you.

Amy made him a curtsy, and the poor girl looked so contented with joy, that she could not speak, but her colour came and went, and every now and then she blushed as red as scarlet, and the next minute looked as pale as death. Well, having said this, he sat down, made me sit down, and then drank to me, and made me drink two glasses of wine together; For, says he, you have need of it; and so indeed I had. When he had done so, Come Amy, says he, with your mistress's leave, you shall have a glass too. So he made her drink two glasses also; and then rising up, And now, Amy, says he, go and get dinner; and you, madam, says he to me, go up and dress you, and come down and smile, and be merry; adding, I'll make you easy, if I can; and in the mean time, he said, he would walk in the garden.

When he was gone, Amy changed her countenance, indeed, and looked as merry as ever she did in her life. Dear madam, says she, what does this gentleman mean? Nay, Amy, said I, he means to do us good, you see, don't he? I know no other meaning he can have, for he can get nothing by me. I warrant you, madam, says she, he'll ask you a favour by and by. No, no, you are mistaken, Amy, I dare say, said I; you have heard what he said, didn't you? Ay, says Amy, it's no matter for that, you shall see what he will do after dinner. Well, well, Amy, says I, you have hard thoughts of him: I cannot be of your opinion: I don't see anything in him yet that looks like it. As to that, madam, says Amy, I don't see anything of it yet neither; but what should move a gentleman to take pity of us, as he does? Nay, says I, that's a hard thing too, that we should judge a man to be wicked because he's charitable; and vicious because he's kind. O madam, says Amy, there's abundance of charity begins in that vice; and he is not so unacquainted with things as not to know that poverty is the strongest incentive; a temptation against which no virtue is powerful enough to stand out; he knows your condition as well as you do. Well, and what then? Why then he knows too that you are young and handsome, and he has the surest bait in the world to take you with.

Well, Amy, said I, but he may find himself mistaken, too, in such a thing as that. Why, madam, says Amy, I hope you won't deny him if he should offer it.

What d'ye mean by that, hussy? said I; no, I'd starve first.

I hope not, madam, I hope you would be wiser; I'm sure if he will set you up, as he talks of, you ought to deny him

nothing; and you will starve if you do not consent, that's certain.

What, consent to lie with him for bread? Amy, said I, how can you talk so!

Nay, madam, says Amy, I don't think you would for anything else; it would not be lawful for anything else, but for bread, madam; why nobody can starve, there's no bearing that, I'm sure.

Ay, says I, but if he would give me an estate to live on, he should not lie with me, I assure you.

Why, look you, madam; if he would but give you enough to live easy upon, he should lie with me for it with all my heart.

That's a token, Amy, of inimitable kindness to me, said I, and I know how to value it: but there's more friendship than honesty in it, Amy.

O madam, says Amy, I'd do anything to get you out of this sad condition; as to honesty, I think honesty is out of the question when starving is the case: are not we almost starved to death?

I am indeed, said I, and thou art for my sake; but to be a whore, Amy! and there I stopped.

Dear madam, says Amy, if I will starve for your sake, I will be a whore, or anything, for your sake: why, I would die for you, if I were put to it.

Why that's an excess of affection, Amy, said I, I never met with before; I wish I may be ever in condition to make you some returns suitable. But however, Amy, you shall not be a whore to him, to oblige him to be kind to me; no, Amy, nor I won't be a whore to him, if he would give me much more than he is able to give me, or do for me.

Why madam, says Amy, I don't say I will go and ask him; but I say, if he should promise to do so and so for you, and the condition was such that he would not serve you unless I would let him lie with me, he should lie with me as often as he would, rather than you should not have his assistance. But this is but talk, madam; I don't see any need of such discourse, and you are of opinion that there will be no need of it.

Indeed so I am, Amy; but, said I, if there was, I tell you again, I'd die before I would consent, or before you should consent for my sake.

Hitherto I had not only preserved the virtue itself, but the virtuous inclination and resolution; and had I kept myself there I had been happy, though I had perished of mere hunger; for without question, a woman ought rather to die than to prostitute her virtue and honour, let the temptation be what it will.

But to return to my story; he walked about the garden, which was, indeed, all in disorder, and overrun with weeds because I had not been able to hire a gardener to do anything to it, no, not so much as to dig up ground enough to sow a few turnips and carrots for family use. After he had viewed it, he came in, and sent Amy to fetch a poor man, a gardener, that used to help our man-servant, and carried him into the garden, and ordered him to do several things in it, to put it into a little order; and this took him up near an hour.

By this time I had dressed me as well as I could, for though I had good linen left still, yet I had but a poor head-dress, and no knots, but old fragments; no necklace, no earrings; all those things were gone long ago, for mere bread.

However, I was tight and clean, and in better plight than he had seen me in a great while, and he looked extremely pleased to see me so; for he said I looked so disconsolate and so afflicted before, that it grieved him to see me; and he bade me pluck up a good heart, for he hoped to put me in a condition to live in the world, and be beholden to nobody.

I told him that was impossible, for I must be beholden to him for it, for all the friends I had in the world would not or could not do so much for me as that he spoke of. Well, widow, says he (so he called me, and so indeed I was, in the worst sense that desolate word could be used in), if you are beholden to me, you shall be beholden to nobody else.

By this time dinner was ready, and Amy came in to lay the cloth, and indeed it was happy there was none to dine but he and I, for I had but six plates left in the house, and but two dishes; however, he knew how things were, and bade me make no scruple about bringing out what I had. He hoped to see me in a better plight. He did not come, he said, to be entertained, but to entertain me, and comfort and encourage me. Thus he went on, speaking so cheerfully to me, and such cheerful things, that it was a cordial to my very soul to hear him speak.

Well, we went to dinner: I'm sure I had not eat a good meal hardly in a twelvemonth ; at least not of such a joint of meat as the loin of veal was. I eat, indeed, very heartily, and so did he, and he made me drink three or four glasses of wine ; so that, in short, my spirits were lifted up to a degree I had not been used to, and I was not only cheeeful, but merry ; and so he pressed me to be.

I told him I had a great deal of reason to be merry, seeing he had been so kind to me, and had given me hopes of recovering me from the worst circumstances that ever woman of any sort of fortune was sunk into ; that he could not but believe that what he had said to me was like life from the dead ; that it was like recovering one sick from the brink of the grave ; how I should ever make him a return any way suitable, was what I had not yet had time to think of ; I could only say that I should never forget it while I had life, and should be always ready to acknowledge it.

He said that was all he desired of me ; that his reward would be the satisfaction of having rescued me from misery ; that he found he was obliging one that knew what gratitude meant ; that he would make it his business to make me completely easy, first or last, if it lay in his power ; and in the mean time, he bade me consider of anything that I thought he might do for me, for my advantage, and in order to make me perfectly easy.

After we had talked thus, he bade me be cheerful. Come, says he, lay aside these melancholy things, and let us be merry. Amy waited at the table, and she smiled and laughed and was so merry she could hardly contain it, for the girl loved me to an excess hardly to be described ; and it was such an unexpected thing to hear any one talk to her mistress, that the wench was besides herself almost, and, as soon as dinner was over, Amy went up stairs, and put on her best clothes too, and came down dressed like a gentlewoman.

We sat together talking of a thousand things, of what had been, and what was to be, all the rest of the day, and in the evening he took his leave of me, with a thousand expressions of kindness and tenderness, and true affection to me, but offered not the least of what my maid Amy had suggested.

At his going away he took me in his arms, protested an honest kindness to me ; said a thousand kind things to me, which I cannot now recollect ; and after kissing me twenty times or thereabouts, put a guinea into my hand, which he said was for my present supply, and told me that he would see me again before it was out; also he gave Amy half-a-crown.

When he was gone, Well, Amy, said I, are you convinced now that he is an honest as well as a true friend, and that there has been nothing, not the least appearance of anything of what you imagined, in his behaviour? Yes, says Amy, I am, but I admire at it; he is such a friend as the world sure has not abundance of to show.

I am sure, says I, he is such a friend as I have long wanted, and as I have as much need of as any creature in the world has, or ever had. And, in short, I was so overcome with the comfort of it, that I sat down and cried for joy a good while, as I had formerly cried for sorrow. Amy and I went to bed that night (for Amy lay with me) pretty early, but lay chatting almost all night about it, and the girl was so transported that she got up two or three times in the night and danced about the room in her shift; in short, the girl was half distracted with the joy of it; a testimony still of her violent affection for her mistress, in which no servant ever went beyond her.

We heard no more of him for two days, but the third day he came again; then he told me, with the same kindness, that he had ordered me a supply of household goods for the furnishing the house; that in particular he had sent me back all the goods that he had seized for rent, which consisted, indeed, of the best of my former furniture; and now, says he, I'll tell you what I have had in my head for you for your present supply, and that is, says he, that the house being well furnished, you shall let it out to lodgings for the summer gentry, says he, by which you will easily get a good comfortable subsistence, especially seeing you shall pay me no rent for two years, nor after neither, unless you can afford it.

This was the first view I had of living comfortably indeed, and it was a very probable way, I must confess, seeing we had very good conveniences, six rooms on a floor, and three stories high. While he was laying down the scheme of my management, came a cart to the door with a load of goods, and an upholsterer's man to put them up; they were chiefly the furniture of two rooms which he had carried away for his two years' rent, with two fine cabinets, and some pier-glasses out of the parlour, and several other valuable things.

These were all restored to their places, and he told me he gave them me freely, as a satisfaction for the cruelty he had used me with before; and the furniture of one room being finished and set up, he told me he would furnish one chamber for himself, and would come and be one of my lodgers, if I would give him leave.

I told him he ought not to ask me leave, who had so much right to make himself welcome; so the house began to look in some tolerable figure, and clean; the garden also, in about a fortnight's work, began to look something less like a wilderness than it used to do; and he ordered me to put up a bill for letting rooms, reserving one for himself, to come to as he saw occasion.

When all was done to his mind, as to placing the goods, he seemed very well pleased, and we dined together again of his own providing; and, the upholsterer's man gone, after dinner he took me by the hand; Come now, madam, says he, you must show me your house (for he had a mind to see everything over again). No, sir, said I, but I'll go show you your house, if you please; so we went up through all the rooms, and in the room which was appointed for himself, Amy was doing something; Well, Amy, says he, I intend to lie with you to-morrow night. To-night if you please, sir, says Amy, very innocently; your room is quite ready. Well, Amy, says he, I am glad you are so willing. No, says Amy, I mean your chamber is ready to-night, and away she run out of the room, ashamed enough; for the girl meant no harm, whatever she had said to me in private.

However, he said no more then; but when Amy was gone, he walked about the room, and looked at everything, and taking me by the hand he kissed me, and spoke a great many kind affectionate things to me indeed; as of his measures for my advantage, and what he would do to raise me again in the world; told me that my afflictions, and the conduct I had shown in bearing them to such an extremity, had so engaged him to me, that he valued me infinitely above all the women in the world; that though he was under such engagements that he could not marry me (his wife and he had been parted for some reasons, which make too long a story to intermix with mine), yet that he would be everything else that a woman could ask in a husband; and with that he kissed me again, and took me in his arms, but offered not the least uncivil action to me; and told me he hoped I would not deny him all the favours he should ask, because he resolved to ask nothing of me but what it was fit for a woman of virtue and modesty, for such he knew me to be, to yield.

I confess the terrible pressure of my former misery, the memory of which lay heavy upon my mind, and the surprising kindness with which he had delivered me, and withal, the expectations of what he might still do for me, were powerful things, and made me have scarce the power to deny him anything he would ask; however, I told him thus, with an air of tenderness too, that he had done so much for me, that I thought I ought to deny him nothing; only I hoped and depended upon him, that he would not take the advantage of the infinite obligations I was under to him, to desire anything of me the yielding to which would lay me lower in his esteem than I desired to be; that as I took him to be a man of honour, so I knew he could not like me better for doing anything that was below a woman of honesty and good manners to do.

He told me, that he had done all this for me, without so much as telling me what kindness or real affection he had for me, that I might not be under any necessity of yielding to him in anything for want of bread; and he would no more oppress my gratitude now than he would my necessity before, nor ask anything, supposing he would stop his favours or withdraw his kindness, if he was denied; it was true, he said, he might tell me more freely his mind now than before, seeing I had let him see that I accepted his assistance, and saw that he was sincere in his design of serving me; that he had gone thus far to show me that he was kind to me, but that now he would tell me that he loved me, and yet would demonstrate that his love was both honourable, and that what he should desire was what he might honestly ask, and I might honestly grant.

I answered, that within those two limitations, I was sure I ought to deny him nothing, and I should think myself not ungrateful only, but very unjust, if I should; so he said no more, but I observed he kissed me more, and took me in his arms in a kind of familiar way, more than usual, and which once or twice put me in mind of my maid Amy's words; and yet, I must acknowledge, I was so overcome with his goodness to me in those many kind things he had done, that I not only was easy at what he did, and made no resistance, but was inclined to do the like, whatever he had offered to do. But he went no farther than what I have said, nor did he offer so much as to sit down on the bed-side with me, but took his leave, said he loved me tenderly, and would convince me of it by such demonstrations as should be to my satisfaction. I told him I had a great deal of reason to believe him, that he was full master of the whole house and of me, as far as was within the bounds we had spoken of, which I believed he would not break, and asked him if he would not lodge there that night.

He said he could not well stay that night, business requiring him in London, but added, smiling, that he would come the next day and take a night's lodging with me. I pressed him to stay that night, and told him I should be glad a friend so valuable should be under the same roof with me; and indeed I began at that time not only to be much obliged to him, but to love him too, and that in a manner that I had not been acquainted with myself.

O let no woman slight the temptation that being generously delivered from trouble is to any spirit furnished with gratitude and just principles. This gentleman had freely and voluntarily delivered me from misery, from poverty, and rags; he had made me what I was, and put me into a way to be even more than I ever was, namely, to live happy and pleased, and on his bounty I depended. What could I say to this gentleman when he pressed me to yield to him, and argued the lawfulness of it? But of that in its place.

I pressed him again to stay that night, and told him it was the first completely happy night that I had ever had in the house in my life, and I should be very sorry to have it be without his company, who was the cause and foundation of it all; that we would be innocently merry, but that it could never be without him; and, in short, I courted him so, that he said he could not deny me, but he would take his horse and go to London, do the business he had to do, which it seems was to pay a foreign bill that was due that night, and would else be protested, and that he would come back in three hours at farthest, and sup with me; but bade me get nothing there, for since I was resolved to be merry, which was what he desired above all things, he would send me something from London; And we will make it a wedding supper, my dear, says he; and with that word took me in his arms, and kissed me so vehemently, that I made no question but he intended to do everything else that Amy had talked of.

I started a little at the word wedding. What do ye mean, to call it by such a name? says I; adding, We will have a supper, but t'other is impossible, as well on your side as mine; he laughed; Well, says he, you shall call it what you will, but it may be the same thing, for I shall satisfy you it is not so impossible as you make it.

I don't understand you, said I; have not I a husband and you a wife?

Well, well, says he, we will talk of that after supper; so he rose up, gave me another kiss, and took his horse for London.

This kind of discourse had fired my blood, I confess, and I knew not what to think of it; it was plain now that he intended to lie with me, but how he would reconcile it to a legal thing, like a marriage, that I could not imagine. We had both of us used Amy with so much intimacy, and trusted her with everything, having such unexampled instances of her fidelity, that he made no scruple to kiss me and say all these things to me before her; nor had he cared one farthing if I would have let him lie with me, to have had Amy there too all night. When he was gone, Well, Amy, says I, what will all this come to now? I am all in a sweat at him. Come to, madam, says Amy, I see what it will come to, I must put you to bed to-night together. Why you would not be so impudent, you jade you, says I, would you? Yes, I would, says she, with all my heart, and think you both as honest as ever you were in your lives.

What ails the slut to talk so? said I; honest! how can it be honest? Why, I'll tell you, madam, says Amy, I sounded it as soon as I heard him speak, and it is very true too; he calls you widow, and such indeed you are, for as my master has left you so many years, he is dead to be sure; at least he is dead to you; he is no husband; you are and ought to be free to marry who you will; and his wife being gone from him, and refusing to lie with him, then he is a single man again as much as ever; and though you cannot bring the laws of the land to join you together, yet one refusing to do the office of a wife, and the other of a husband, you may certainly take one another fairly.

Nay, Amy, says I, if I could take him fairly, you may be sure I'd take him above all the men in the world ; it turned the very heart within me when I heard him say he loved me ; how could it do otherwise, when you know what a condition I was in before, despised and trampled on by all the world ? I could have took him in my arms and kissed him as freely as he did me, if it had not been for shame.

Ay, and all the rest too, says Amy, at the first word ; I don't see how you can think of denying him anything ; has he not brought you out of the devil's clutches, brought you out of the blackest misery that ever poor lady was reduced to ? Can a woman deny such a man anything ?

Nay, I don't know what to do, Amy, says I ; I hope he won't desire anything of that kind of me, I hope he won't attempt it ; if he does, I know not what to say to him.

Not ask you, says Amy ; depend upon it he will ask you, and you will grant it too ; I am sure my mistress is no fool ; come, pray madam, let me go air you a clean shift ; don't let him find you in foul linen the wedding night.

But that I know you to be a very honest girl, Amy, says I, you would make me abhor you ; why, you argue for the devil, as if you were one of his privy counsellors.

It's no matter for that, madam, I say nothing but what I think ; you own you love this gentleman, and he has given you sufficient testimony of his affection to you ; your conditions are alike unhappy, and he is of opinion that he may take another woman, his first wife having broke her honour, and living from him ; and that though the laws of the land will not allow him to marry formally, yet that he may take another woman into his arms, provided he keeps true to the other woman as a wife ; nay, he says it is usual to do so, and allowed by the custom of the place, in several countries abroad ; and, I must own, I am of the same mind ; else it is in the power of a whore, after she has jilted and abandoned her husband, to confine him from the pleasure as well as convenience of a woman all the days of his life, which would be very unreasonable, and, as times go, not tolerable to all people ; and the like on your side, madam.

Had I now had my senses about me, and had my reason not been overcome by the powerful attraction of so kind, so beneficent a friend : had I consulted conscience and virtue, I should have repelled this Amy, however faithful and honest to me in other things, as a viper, and engine of the devil.

I ought to have remembered, that neither he or I, either by the laws of God or man, could come together upon any other terms than that of notorious adultery. The ignorant jade's argument, that he had brought me out of the hands of the devil, by which she meant the devil of poverty and distress, should have been a powerful motive to me not to plunge myself into the jaws of hell, and into the power of the real devil, in recompense for that deliverance. I should have looked upon all the good this man had done for me, to have been the particular work of the goodness of Heaven, and that goodness should have moved me to a return of duty and humble obedience. I should have received the mercy thankfully, and applied it soberly, to the praise and honour of my Maker; whereas, by this wicked course, all the bounty and kindness of this gentleman became a snare to me, was a mere bait to the devil's hook; I received his kindness at the dear expense of body and soul, mortgaging faith, religion, conscience, and modesty, for (as I may call it) a morsel of bread; or if you will, ruined my soul from a principle of gratitude, and gave myself up to the devil, to show myself grateful to my benefactor. I must do the gentleman that justice as to say, I verily believe that he did nothing but what he thought was lawful; and I must do that justice upon myself as to say, I did what my own conscience convinced me, at the very time I did it, was horribly unlawful, scandalous, and abominable.

But poverty was my snare; dreadful poverty! The misery I had been in was great, such as would make the heart tremble at the apprehensions of its return; and I might appeal to any that has had any experience of the world, whether one so entirely destitute as I was of all manner of all helps, or friends, either to support me, or to assist me to support myself, could withstand the proposal; not that I plead this as a justification of my conduct, but that it may move the pity even of those that abhor the crime.

Besides this, I was young, handsome, and, with all the mortifications I had met with, was vain, and that not a little; and, as it was a new thing, so it was a pleasant thing to be courted, caressed, embraced, and high professions of affection made to me, by a man so agreeable, and so able to do me good.

Add to this, that if I had ventured to disoblige this gentleman, I had no friend in the world to have recourse to; I had no prospect, no, not of a bit of bread; I had nothing before me but to fall back into the same misery that I had been in before.

Amy had but too much rhetoric in this cause; she represented all those things in their proper colours, she argued them all with her utmost skill, and at last the merry jade, when she came to dress me, Look ye, madam, said she, if you won't consent, tell him you will do as Rachael did to Jacob, when she could have no children, put her maid to bed to him; tell him you cannot comply with him, but there's Amy, he may ask her the question, she has promised me she won't deny you.

And would you have me say so, Amy? said I.

No, madam, but I would really have you do so; besides, you are undone if you do not; and if my doing it would save you from being undone, as I said before, he shall, if he will; if he asks me, I won't deny him, not I; hang me if I do, says Amy.

Well, I know not what to do, says I to Amy. Do! says Amy; your choice is fair and plain; here you may have a handsome, charming gentleman, be rich, live pleasantly, and in plenty, or refuse him, and want a dinner, go in rags, live in tears; in short, beg and starve; you know this is the case, madam, says Amy, I wonder how you can say you know not what to do.

Well, Amy, says I, the case is as you say, and I think verily I must yield to him; but then, said I, moved by conscience, don't talk any more of your cant of its being lawful that I ought to marry again, and that he ought to marry again, and such stuff as that; 'tis all nonsense, says I, Amy, there's nothing in it, let me hear no more of that, for if I yield, 'tis in vain to mince the matter, I am a whore, Amy, neither better nor worse, I assure you.

I don't think so, madam, by no means, says Amy, I wonder how you can talk so; and then she run on with her argument of the unreasonableness that a woman should be obliged to live single, or a man to live single, in such cases as before. Well, Amy, said I, come, let us dispute no more, for the longer I enter into that part, the greater my scruples will be; but if I let it alone, the necessity of my present circumstances is such, that I believe I shall yield to him, if he should importune me much about it ; but I should be glad he would not do it at all, but leave me as I am.

As to that, madam, you may depend, says Amy, he expects to have you for his bedfellow to-night : I saw it plainly in his management all day, and at last he told you so too, as plain, I think, as he could. Well, well, Amy, said I, I don't know what to say ; if he will he must, I think ; I don't know how to resist such a man, that has done so much for me. I don't know how you should, says Amy.

Thus Amy and I canvassed the business between us ; the jade prompted the crime which I had but too much inclination to commit, that is to say, not as a crime, for I had nothing of the vice in my constitution ; my spirits were far from being high, my blood had no fire in it to kindle the flame of desire ; but the kindness and good humour of the man, and the dread of my own circumstances, concurred to bring me to the point, and I even resolved, before he asked, to give up my virtue to him whenever he should put it to the question.

In this I was a double offender, whatever he was, for I was resolved to commit the crime, knowing and owning it to be a crime ; he, if it was true as he said, was fully persuaded it was lawful, and in that persuasion he took the measures, and used all the circumlocutions which I am going to speak of.

About two hours after he was gone, came a Leadenhall basket-woman, with a whole load of good things for the mouth (the particulars are not to the purpose), and brought orders to get supper by eight o'clock ; however, I did not intend to begin to dress anything till I saw him ; and he gave me time enough, for he came before seven, so that Amy, who had gotten one to help her, got everything ready in time.

We sat down to supper about eight, and were indeed very merry ; Amy made us some sport, for she was a girl of spirit and wit, and with her talk she made us laugh very often, and yet the jade managed her wit with all the good manners imaginable.

But to shorten the story ; after supper, he took me up into his chamber, where Amy had made a good fire, and there he pulled out a great many papers, and spread them upon a little table, and then took me by the hand, and after kissing me very much, he entered into a discourse of his circumstances and of mine, how they agreed in several things exactly; for example, that I was abandoned of a husband in the prime of my youth and vigour, and he of a wife in his middle age; how the end of marriage was destroyed by the treatment we had either of us received, and it would be very hard that we should be tied by the formality of the contract where the essence of it was destroyed. I interrupted him, and told him there was a vast difference between our circumstances, and that in the most essential part, namely, that he was rich, and I was poor; that he was above the world, and I infinitely below it; that his circumstances were very easy, mine miserable, and this was an inequality the most essential that could be imagined. As to that, my dear, says he, I have taken such measures as shall make an equality still; and with that he showed me a contract in writing, wherein he engaged himself to me to cohabit constantly with me, to provide for me in all respects as a wife; and repeating in the preamble a long account of the nature and reason of our living together, and an obligation in the penalty of 7,000*l.* never to abandon me; and at last showed me a bond for 500*l.*, to be paid to me, or to my assigns, within three months after his death.

He read over all these things to me, and then, in a most moving affectionate manner, and in words not to be answered, he said, Now, my dear, is this not sufficient? can you object anything against it? if not, as I believe you will not, then let us debate this matter no longer. With that he pulled out a silk purse, which had three-score guineas in it, and threw them into my lap, and concluded all the rest of his discourse with kisses and protestations of his love, of which indeed I had abundant proof.

Pity human frailty, you that read of a woman reduced in her youth and prime to the utmost misery and distress, and raised again, as above, by the unexpected and surprising bounty of a stranger; I say, pity her if she was not able, after all these things, to make any more resistance.

However, I stood out a little longer still; I asked him how he could expect that I could come into a proposal of such consequence the very first time it was moved to me; and that I ought, if I consented to it, to capitulate with him, that he should never upbraid me with easiness, and consenting too soon. He said, No; but, on the contrary, he would take it as a mark of the greatest kindness I could show him. Then he went on to give reasons why there was no occasion to use the ordinary ceremony of delay, or to wait a reasonable time of courtship, which was only to avoid scandal; but, as this was private, it had nothing of that nature in it; that he had been courting me some time by the best of courtship, viz., doing acts of kindness to me; and that he had given testimonies of his sincere affection to me by deeds, not by flattering trifles and the usual courtship of words, which were often found to have very little meaning; that he took me not as a mistress, but as his wife, and protested it was clear to him he might lawfully do it, and that I was perfectly at liberty, and assured me, by all that it was possible for an honest man to say, that he would treat me as his wife as long as he lived; in a word, he conquered all the little resistance I intended to make; he protested he loved me above all the world, and begged I would for once believe him; that he had never deceived me, and never would, but would make it his study to make my life comfortable and happy, and to make me forget the misery I had gone through. I stood still awhile, and said nothing, but seeing him eager for my answer, I smiled, and looking up at him, And must I, then, says I, say yes at first asking? must I depend upon your promise? why, then, said I, upon the faith of that promise, and in the sense of that inexpressible kindness you have shown me, you shall be obliged, and I will be wholly yours to the end of my life; and with that I took his hand, which held me by the hand, and gave it a kiss.

And thus, in gratitude for the favours I received from a man, was all sense of religion and duty to God, all regard to virtue and honour, given up at once, and we were to call one another man and wife, who, in the sense of the laws, both of God and our country, were no more than two adulterers; in short, a whore and a rogue. Nor, as I have said above, was my conscience silent in it, though it seems his was; for I sinned with open eyes, and thereby had a double guilt upon me; as I always said, his notions were of another kind, and he either was before of the opinion, or argued himself into it now, that we were both free, and might lawfully marry.

But I was quite of another side, nay, and my judgment was right, but my circumstances were my temptation; the terrors behind me looked blacker than the terrors before me; and the dreadful argument of wanting bread, and being run into the horrible distresses I was in before, mastered all my resolution, and I gave myself up as above.

The rest of the evening we spent very agreeably to me; he was perfectly good humoured, and was at that time very merry; then he made Amy dance with him, and I told him I would put Amy to bed to him. Amy said, with all her heart, she never had been a bride in her life; in short, he made the girl so merry, that, had he not been to lie with me the same night, I believe he would have played the fool with Amy for half an hour, and the girl would no more have refused him than I intended to do; yet before, I had always found her a very modest wench as any I ever saw in all my life; but, in short, the mirth of that night, and a few more such afterwards, ruined the girl's modesty for ever, as shall appear by and by, in its place.

So far does fooling and toying sometimes go, that I know nothing a young woman has to be more cautious of; so far had this innocent girl gone in jesting between her and I, and in talking that she would let him lie with her, if he would but be kinder to me, that at last she let him lie with her in earnest; and so empty was I now of all principle, that I encouraged the doing it almost before my face.

I say but too justly, that I was empty of principle, because, as above, I had yielded to him, not as deluded to believe it lawful, but as overcome by his kindness, and terrified at the fear of my own misery if he should leave me. So, with my eyes open, and with my conscience, as I may say, awake, I sinned, knowing it to be a sin, but having no power to resist. When this had thus made a hole in my heart, and I was come to such a height as to transgress against the light of my own conscience, I was then fit for any wickedness, and conscience left off speaking where it found it could not be heard.

But to return to our story. Having consented, as above, to his proposal, we had not much more to do. He gave me my writings, and the bond for my maintenance during his life, and for five hundred pounds after his death. And so far was he from abating his affection to me afterwards, that two years after we were thus, as he called it, married, he made his will, and gave me a thousand pounds more, and all my household-stuff, plate, &c which was considerable too.

And put us to bed, and my new friend, I cannot call him husband, was so well pleased with Amy for her fidelity and kindness to me, that he paid her all the arrear of her wages that I owed her, and gave her five guineas over; and had it gone no farther, Amy had richly deserved what she had, for never was a maid so true to a mistress in such dreadful circumstances as I was in; nor was what followed more her own fault than mine, who led her almost into it at first, and quite into it at last; and this may be a farther testimony what a hardness of crime I was now arrived to, which was owing to the conviction, that was from the beginning upon me, that I was a whore, not a wife; nor could I ever frame my mouth to call him husband, or to say "my husband" when I was speaking of him.

We lived, surely, the most agreeable life, the grand exception only excepted, that ever two lived together. He was the most obliging, gentlemanly man, and the most tender of me, that ever woman gave herself up to: nor was there ever the least interruption to our mutual kindness, no, not to the last day of his life. But I must bring Amy's disaster in at once, that I may have done with her.

Amy was dressing me one morning, for now I had two maids, and Amy was my chambermaid. Dear madam, says Amy, what a'n't you with child yet? No, Amy, says I, nor any sign of it.

Law, madam, says Amy, what have you been doing? why you have been married a year and a half: I warrant you, master would have got me with child twice in that time. It may be so, Amy, says I; let him try, can't you? No, says Amy, you'll forbid it now; before, I told you he should, with all my heart; but I won't now, now he's all your own. O, says I, Amy, I'll freely give you my consent; it will be nothing at all to me; nay, I'll put you to bed to him myself one night or other, if you are willing. No, madam, no, says Amy, not now he's yours.

Why, you fool you, says I, don't I tell you I'll put you to bed to him myself. Nay, nay, says Amy, if you put me to bed to him, that's another case; I believe I shall not rise again very soon. I'll venture that, Amy, says I.

After supper that night, and before we were risen from table, I said to him, Amy being by, Hark ye, Mr. —, do you know that you are to lie with Amy to-night? No, not

Amy

I, says he: but turns to Amy, Is it so, Amy? says he. No, sir, says she. Nay, don't say no, you fool; did not I promise to put you to bed to him? But the girl said, No, still, and it passed off.

At night, when we came to go to bed, Amy came into the chamber to undress me, and her master slipped into bed first; then I began, and told him all that Amy had said about my not being with child, and of her being with child twice in that time. Ay, Mrs. Amy, says he, I believe so too: come hither, and we'll try. But Amy did not go. Go, you fool, says I, can't you? I freely give you both leave. But Amy would not go. Nay, you whore, says I, you said, if I would put you to bed, you would with all your heart. And with that, I sat her down, pulled off her stockings and shoes, and all her clothes piece by piece, and led her to the bed to him. Here, says I, try what you can do with your maid Amy. She pulled back a little, would not let me pull off her clothes at first, but it was hot weather, and she had not many clothes on, and particularly no stays on; and at last, when she see I was in earnest, she let me do what I would. So I fairly stripped her, and then I threw open the bed, and thrust her in.

I need say no more. This is enough to convince anybody that I did not think him my husband, and that I had cast off all principle, and all modesty, and had effectually stifled conscience.

Amy, I dare say, began now to repent, and would fain have got out of bed again; but he said to her, Nay, Amy, you see your mistress has put you to bed, 'tis all her doing, you must blame her. So he held her fast, and the wench being naked in the bed with him, it was too late to look back, so she lay still and let him do what he would with her.

Had I looked upon myself as a wife, you cannot suppose I would have been willing to have let my husband lie with my maid, much less before my face, for I stood by all the while; but as I thought myself a whore, I cannot say but that it was something designed in my thoughts, that my maid should be a whore too, and should not reproach me with it.

Amy, however, less vicious than I, was grievously out of sorts the next morning, and cried and took on most vehemently, that she was ruined and undone, and there was no pacifying her; she was a whore, a slut, and she was undone!

undone! and cried almost all day. I did all I could to pacify her. A whore! says I, well, and am not I a whore as well as you? No, no, says Amy, no, you are not, for you are married. Not I, Amy, says I, I do not pretend to it. He may marry you to-morrow, if he will, for anything I could do to hinder it. I am not married. I do not look upon it as anything. Well, all did not pacify Amy, but she cried two or three days about it; but it wore off by degrees.

But the case differed between Amy and her master exceedingly; for Amy retained the same kind temper she always had: but, on the contrary, he was quite altered, for he hated her heartily, and could, I believe, have killed her after it, and he told me so, for he thought this a vile action; whereas what he and I had done he was perfectly easy in, thought it just, and esteemed me as much his wife as if we had been married from our youth, and had neither of us known any other; nay, he loved me, I believe, as entirely as if I had been the wife of his youth. Nay, he told me it was true, in one sense, that he had two wives, but that I was the wife of his affection, the other the wife of his aversion.

I was extremely concerned at the aversion he had taken to my maid Amy, and used my utmost skill to get it altered; for though he had, indeed, debauched the wench, I knew that I was the principal occasion of it; and as he was the best-humoured man in the world, I never gave him over till I prevailed with him to be easy with her, and as I was now become the devil's agent, to make others as wicked as myself, I brought him to lie with her again several times after that, till at last, as the poor girl said, so it happened, and she was really with child.

She was terribly concerned at it, and so was he too. Come, my dear, says I, when Rachel put her handmaid to bed to Jacob, she took the children as her own. Don't be uneasy; I'll take the child as my own. Had not I a hand in the frolic of putting her to bed to you? It was my fault as much as yours. So I called Amy, and encouraged her too, and told her that I would take care of the child and her too, and added the same argument to her. For, says I, Amy, it was all my fault; did not I drag your clothes off of your back, and put you to bed to him? Thus I that had, indeed, been the cause of all the wickedness between them, encouraged them both, when they had any remorse about it, and rather prompted them to go on with it, than to repent of it.

When Amy grew big, she went to a place I had provided for her, and the neighbours knew nothing but that Amy and I was parted. She had a fine child indeed, a daughter, and we had it nursed, and Amy came again in about half a year to live with her old mistress; but neither my gentleman, or Amy either, cared for playing that game over again; for as he said, the jade might bring him a house full of children to keep.

We lived as merrily and as happily after this as could be expected, considering our circumstances; I mean as to the pretended marriage, &c.; and as to that my gentleman had not the least concern about him for it. But as much as I was hardened, and that was as much as I believe ever any wicked creature was, yet I could not help it, there was and would be hours of intervals and of dark reflections which came involuntarily in, and thrust in sighs into the middle of all my songs; and there would be sometimes a heaviness of heart which intermingled itself with all my joy, and which would often fetch a tear from my eye. And let others pretend what they will, I believe it impossible to be otherwise with anybody. There can be no substantial satisfaction in a life of known wickedness; conscience will and does often break in upon them at particular times, let them do what they can to prevent it.

But I am not to preach, but to relate, and whatever loose reflections were, and how often soever those dark intervals came on, I did my utmost to conceal them from him; ay, and to suppress and smother them too in myself; and, to outward appearance, we lived as cheerfully and agreeably as it was possible for any couple in the world to live.

After I had thus lived with him something above two year, truly I found myself with child too; my gentleman was mightily pleased at it, and nothing could be kinder than he was in the preparations he made for me, and for my lying-in, which was, however, very private, because I cared for as little company as possible; nor had I kept up my neighbourly acquaintance, so that I had nobody to invite upon such an occasion.

I was brought to bed very well (of a daughter too, as well as Amy), but the child died at about six weeks old, so all that work was to do over again, that is to say, the charge, the expense, the travail, &c.

The next year I made him amends, and brought him a son, to his great satisfaction; it was a charming child, and did very well. After this, my husband, as he called himself, came to me one evening, and told me he had a very difficult thing happened to him, which he knew not what to do in, or how to resolve about, unless I would make him easy; this was, that his occasions required him to go over to France for about two months.

Well, my dear, says I, and how shall I make you easy?

Why, by consenting to let me go, says he; upon which condition, I'll tell you the occasion of my going, that you may judge of the necessity there is for it on my side. Then, to make me easy in his going, he told me he would make his will before he went, which should be to my full satisfaction.

I told him the last part was so kind that I could not decline the first part, unless he would give me leave to add, that if it was not for putting him to an extraordinary expense, I would go over along with him.

He was so pleased with this offer, that he told me he would give me full satisfaction for it, and accept of it too; so he took me to London with him the next day, and there he made his will, and showed it to me, and sealed it before proper witnesses, and then gave it to me to keep. In this will he gave a thousand pounds to a person that we both knew very well, in trust, to pay it, with the interest from the time of his decease, to me or my assigns; then he willed the payment of my jointure, as he called it, viz., his bond of five hundred pounds after his death; also, he gave me all my household-stuff, plate, &c.

This was a most engaging thing for a man to do to one under my circumstances; and it would have been hard, as I told him, to deny him anything, or to refuse to go with him anywhere. So we settled everything as well as we could, left Amy in charge with the house, and for his other business, which was in jewels, he had two men he intrusted, who he had good security for, and who managed for him, and corresponded with him.

Things being thus concerted, we went away to France, arrived safe at Calais, and by easy journeys came in eight days more to Paris, where we lodged in the house of an English merchant of his acquaintance, and was very courteously entertained.

My gentleman's business was with some persons of the first rank, and to whom he had sold some jewels of very good value, and received a great sum of money in specie; and as he told me privately, he gained three thousand pistoles by his bargain, but would not suffer the most intimate friend he had there to know what he had received; for it is not so safe a thing in Paris to have a great sum of money in keeping as it might be in London.

We made this journey much longer than we intended, and my gentleman sent for one of his managers in London to come over to us to Paris, with some diamonds, and sent him back to London again to fetch more; then other business fell into his hands so unexpectedly, that I began to think we should take up our constant residence there, which I was not very averse to, it being my native country, and I spoke the language perfectly well; so we took a good house in Paris, and lived very well there; and I sent for Amy to come over to me, for I lived gallantly, and my gentleman was two or three times going to keep me a coach, but I declined it, especially at Paris; but as they have those conveniences by the day there, at a certain rate, I had an equipage provided for me whenever I pleased, and I lived here in a very good figure, and might have lived higher if I pleased.

But in the middle of all this felicity, a dreadful disaster befel me, which entirely unhinged all my affairs, and threw me back into the same state of life that I was in before; with this one happy exception, however, that whereas before I was poor, even to misery, now I was not only provided for, but very rich.

My gentleman had the name in Paris for a very rich man, and, indeed, he was so, though not so immensely rich as people imagined; but that which was fatal to him was, that he generally carried a shagreen case in his pocket, especially when he went to court, or to the houses of any of the princes of the blood, in which he had jewels of very great value.

It happened one day, that being to go to Versailles to wait upon the prince of —, he came up into my chamber in the morning, and laid out his jewel-case, because he was not going to show any jewels, but to get a foreign bill accepted, which he had received from Amsterdam; so when he gave me the case, he said, My dear, I think I need not carry this with me, because it may be I may not come back till night, and it is too much to venture. I returned, Then my dear, you shan't go. Why, says he. Because, as they are too much for you, so you are too much for me to venture, and you shall not go, unless you will promise me not to stay so as to come back in the night.

I hope there's no danger, said he, seeing that I have nothing about me of any value; and therefore, lest I should, take that too, says he, and gives me his gold watch, and a rich diamond, which he had in a ring, and always wore on his finger.

Well, but my dear, says I, you make me more uneasy now than before: for if you apprehend no danger, why do you use this caution? and if you apprehend there is danger, why do you go at all?

There is no danger says he, if I do not stay late, and I do not design to do so.

Well, but promise me then that you won't, says I, or else I cannot let you go.

I won't indeed my dear, says he, unless I am obliged to it; I assure you I do not intend it; but if I should, I am not worth robbing now, for I have nothing about me but about six pistoles in my little purse, and that little ring, showing me a small diamond ring, worth about ten or twelve pistoles, which he put upon his finger, in the room of the rich one he usually wore.

I still pressed him not to stay late, and he said he would not. But if I am kept late, says he, beyond my expectation, I'll stay all night, and come next morning. This seemed a very good caution; but still my mind was very uneasy about him, and I told him so, and entreated him not to go; I told him I did not know what might be the reason, but that I had a strange terror upon my mind about his going, and that if he did go, I was persuaded some harm would attend him: he smiled, and returned, Well, my dear, if it should be so, you are now richly provided for, all that I have here I give to you. And with that he takes up the casket or case, Here says he, hold your hand, there is a good estate for you in this case; if anything happens to me 'tis all your own, I give it you for yourself; and with that he put the casket, the fine ring, and his gold watch, all into my hands, and the key of his scrutoire besides, adding, And in my scrutoire there is some money, it is all your own.

I stared at him as if I was frightened, for I thought all his face looked like a death's head; and then, immediately, I thought I perceived his head all bloody, and then his clothes looked bloody too, and immediately it all went off, and he looked as he really did; immediately I fell a crying, and hung about him; My dear, said I, I am frightened to death, you shall not go, depend upon it some mischief will befall you. I did not tell him how my vapourish fancy had represented him to me; that, I thought was not proper; besides, he would only have laughed at me, and would have gone away with a jest about it; but I pressed him seriously not to go that day, or, if he did, to promise me to come home to Paris again by daylight. He looked a little graver then than he did before, told me was not apprehensive of the least danger, but if there was, he would either take care to come in the day, or, as he had said before, would stay all night.

But all these promises came to nothing, for he was set upon in the open day, and robbed by three men on horseback, masked, as he went; and one of them, who it seems rifled him while the rest stood to stop the coach, stabbed him into the body with a sword, so that he died immediately. He had a footman behind the coach, who they knocked down with the stock or butt-end of a carabine. They were supposed to kill him because of the disappointment they met with in not getting his case or casket of diamonds, which they knew he carried about him; and this was supposed, because, after they had killed him, they made the coachman drive out of the road a long way over the heath, till they came to a convenient place, where they pulled him out of the coach and searched his clothes more narrowly than they could do while he was alive.

But they found nothing but his little ring, six pistoles, and the value of about seven livres in small moneys.

This was a dreadful blow to me, though I cannot say I was so surprised as I should otherwise have been, for all the while he was gone, my mind was oppressed with the weight of my own thoughts, and I was as sure that I should never see him any more, that I think nothing could be like it. The impression was so strong, that I think nothing could make so deep a wound that was imaginary; and I was so dejected and disconsolate, that when I received the news of his disaster, there was no room for any extraordinary alteration in me. I had cried all that day, eat nothing, and only waited, as I might say, to receive the dismal news, which I had brought to me about five o'clock in the afternoon.

I was in a strange country, and though I had a pretty many acquaintances, had but very few friends that I could consult on this occasion. All possible inquiry was made after the rogues that had been thus barbarous, but nothing could be heard of them; nor was it possible that the footman could make any discovery of them by his description, for they knocked him down immediately, so that he knew nothing of what was done afterwards. The coachman was the only man that could say anything, and all his account amounted to no more than this, that one of them had soldier's clothes, but he could not remember the particulars of his mounting, so as to know what regiment he belonged to; and as to their faces, that he could know nothing of, because they had all of them masks on.

I had him buried as decently as the place would permit a protestant stranger to be buried, and made some of the scruples and difficulties on that account easy, by the help of money to a certain person, who went impudently to the curate of the parish of St. Sulpitius, in Paris, and told him, that the gentleman that was killed was a catholic; that the thieves had taken from him a cross of gold, set with diamonds, worth six thousand livres; that his widow was a catholic, and had sent by him sixty crowns to the church of —, for masses to be said for the repose of his soul. Upon all which, though not one word was true, he was buried with all the ceremonies of the Roman church.

I think I almost cried myself to death for him, for I abandoned myself to all the excesses of grief; and indeed I loved him to a degree inexpressible; and considering what kindness he had shown me at first, and how tenderly he had used me to the last, what could I do less?

Then the manner of his death was terrible and frightful to me, and, above all, the strange notices I had of it. I had never pretended to the second-sight, or anything of that kind, but certainly if any one ever had such a thing, I had it at this time, for I saw him as plainly in all those terrible shapes as above; first, as a skeleton, not dead only, but rotten and wasted ; secondly, as killed, and his face bloody ; and thirdly, his clothes bloody, and all within the space of one minute, or indeed of a very few moments.

These things amazed me, and I was a good while as one stupid ; however, after some time I began to recover, and look into my affairs. I had the satisfaction not to be left in distress, or in danger of poverty. On the contrary, besides what he had put into my hands fairly in his lifetime, which amounted to a very considerable value, I found above seven hundred pistoles in gold in his scrutoire, of which he had given me the key ; and I found foreign bills accepted for about twelve thousand livres ; so that, in a word, I found myself possessed of almost ten thousand pounds sterling, in a very few days after the disaster.

The first thing I did upon this occasion was to send a letter to my maid, as I still called her, Amy, wherein I gave her an account of my disaster, how my husband, as she called him (for I never called him so), was murdered ; and as I did not know how his relations, or his wife's friends, might act upon that occasion, I ordered her to convey away all the plate, linen, and other things of value, and to secure them in a person's hands that I directed her to, and then to sell or dispose of the furniture of the house, if she could, and so, without acquainting anybody with the reason of her going, withdraw ; sending notice to his head manager at London, that the house was quitted by the tenant, and they might come and take possession of it for the executors. Amy was so dexterous, and did her work so nimbly, that she gutted the house, and sent the key to the said manager, almost as soon as he had notice of the misfortune that befel their master.

Upon their receiving the surprising news of his death, the head manager came over to Paris, and came to the house ; I made no scruple of calling myself Madame —, the widow of Monsieur —, the English jeweller : and as I spoke French naturally, I did not let him know but that I was his wife, married in France, and that I had not heard that he had any wife in England, but pretended to be surprised, and exclaim against him for so base an action ; and that I had good friends in Poictou, where I was born, who would take care to have justice done me in England out of his estate.

I should have observed that, as soon as the news was public, of a man being murdered, and that he was a jeweller, fame did me the favour as to publish presently, that he was robbed of his casket of jewels, which he always carried about him. I confirmed this, among my daily lamentations for his disaster, and added, that he had with him a fine diamond ring, which he was known to wear frequently about him, valued at one hundred pistoles, a gold watch, and a great quantity of diamonds of inestimable value in his casket; which jewels he was carrying to the prince of —, to show some of them to him; and the prince owned that he had spoken to him to bring some such jewels, to let him see them. But I sorely repented this part afterward, as you shall hear.

This rumour put an end to all inquiry after his jewels, his ring, or his watch; and as for the seven hundred pistoles, that I secured. For the bills which were in hand, I owned I had them, but that, as I said, I brought my husband thirty thousand livres portion, I claimed the said bills, which came to not above twelve thousand livres, for my amende; and this, with the plate, and the household-stuff, was the principal of all his estate which they could come at. As to the foreign bill, which he was going to Versailles to get accepted, it was really lost with him; but his manager who had remitted the bill to him, by way of Amsterdam, bringing over the second bill, the money was saved, as they call it, which would otherwise have been also gone; the thieves who robbed and murdered him, were to be sure afraid to send anybody to get the bill accepted, for that would undoubtedly have discovered them.

By this time my maid Amy was arrived, and she gave me an account of her management, and how she had secured everything, and that she had quitted the house, and sent the key to the head manager of his business, and let me know how much she had made of everything, very punctually and honestly.

I should have observed, in the account of his dwelling with me so long at —, that he never passed for anything there but a lodger in the house; and though he was landlord, that did not alter the case. So that at his death, Amy coming to quit the house, and give them the key, there was no affinity between that and the case of their master who was newly killed.

I got good advice at Paris from an eminent lawyer, a counsellor of the parliament there, and laying my case before him, he directed me to make a process in dower upon the estate, for making good my new fortune upon matrimony, which accordingly I did; and, upon the whole, the manager went back to England well satisfied that he had gotten the unaccepted bill of exchange, which was for two thousand five hundred pounds, with some other things, which together amounted to seventeen thousand livres; and thus I got rid of him.

I was visited with great civility on this sad occasion of the loss of my husband, as they thought him, by a great many ladies of quality. And the prince of —, to whom it was reported he was carrying the jewels, sent his gentleman with a very handsome compliment of condolence to me; and his gentleman, whether with or without order, hinted as if his highness did intend to have visited me himself, but that some accident, which he made a long story of, had prevented him.

By the concourse of ladies and others that thus came to visit me, I began to be much known; and as I did not forget to set myself out with all possible advantage, considering the dress of a widow, which in those days was a most frightful thing; I say, as I did thus from my own vanity, for I was not ignorant that I was very handsome; I say, on this account I was soon made very public, and was known by the name of la belle veufeu de Poictou, or the pretty widow of Poictou. As I was very well pleased to see myself thus handsomely used in my affliction, it soon dried up all my tears; and though I appeared as a widow, yet, as we say in England, it was of a widow comforted. I took care to let the ladies see that I knew how to receive them, that I was not at a loss how to behave to any of them; and, in short, I began to be very popular there; but I had an occasion afterwards which made me decline that kind of management, as you shall hear presently.

About four days after I had received the compliments of condolence from the prince —, the same gentleman he had sent before came to tell me that his highness was coming to give me a visit. I was indeed surprised at that, and perfectly at a loss how to behave. However, as there was no remedy, I prepared to receive him as well as I could. It was not many minutes after, but he was at the door, and came in, introduced by his own gentleman, as above, and after, by my woman Amy.

He treated me with abundance of civility, and condoled handsomely the loss of my husband, and likewise the manner of it. He told me he understood he was coming to Versailles to himself, to show him some jewels; that it was true that he had discoursed with him about jewels, but could not imagine how any villains should hear of his coming at that time with them; that he had not ordered him to attend with them at Versailles, but told him that he would come to Paris by such a day, so that he was no way accessory to the disaster. I told him gravely I knew very well that all his highness had said of that part was true; that these villains knew his profession, and knew, no doubt, that he always carried a casket of jewels about him, and that he always wore a diamond ring on his finger worth a hundred pistoles, which report had magnified to five hundred; and that if he had been going to any other place, it would have been the same thing. After this his highness rose up to go, and told me he had resolved however to make me some reparation; and with these words put a silk purse into my hand with a hundred pistoles, and told me he would make me a farther compliment of a small pension, which his gentleman would inform me of.

You may be sure I behaved with a due sense of so much goodness, and offered to kneel to kiss his hand; but he took me up and saluted me, and sat down again (though before he made as if he was going away), making me sit down by him.

He then began to talk with me more familiarly; told me he hoped I was not left in bad circumstances; that Mr. — was reputed to be very rich, and that he had gained lately great sums by some jewels, and he hoped, he said, that I had still a fortune agreeable to the condition I had lived in before.

I replied, with some tears, which, I confess, were a little forced, that I believed, if Mr. — had lived, we should have been out of danger of want, but that it was impossible to estimate the loss which I had sustained, besides that of the life of my husband. That, by the opinion of those that knew something of his affairs, and of what value the jewels were which he intended to have shown to his highness, he could not have less about him than the value of a hundred thousand livres. That it was a fatal blow to me, and to his whole family, especially that they should be lost in such a manner.

His highness returned, with an air of concern, that he was very sorry for it; but he hoped, if I settled in Paris, I might find ways to restore my fortune; at the same time he complimented me upon my being very handsome, as he pleased to call it, and that I could not fail of admirers. I stood up and humbly thanked his highness, but told him I had no expectations of that kind; that I thought I should be obliged to go over to England, to look after my husband's effects there, which I was told were considerable; but that I did not know what justice a poor stranger would get among them; and as for Paris, my fortune being so impaired, I saw nothing before me but to go back to Poictou to my friends, where some of my relations, I hoped, might do something for me, and added, that one of my brothers was an abbot at —, near Poitiers.

He stood up, and taking me by the hand, led me to a large looking-glass, which made up the pier in the front of the parlour, Look there, madam, said he, is it fit that that face (pointing to my figure in the glass) should go back to Poictou? No, madam, says he, stay and make some gentleman of quality happy, that may, in return, make you forget all your sorrows; and with that he took me in his arms, and kissing me twice, told me he would see me again, but with less ceremony.

Some little time after this, but the same day, his gentleman came to me again, and, with great ceremony and respect, delivered me a black box tied with a scarlet riband, and sealed with a noble coat of arms, which I suppose was the prince's.

There was in it a grant from his highness, or an assignment, I know not which to call it, with a warrant to his banker to pay me two thousand livres a year, during my stay in Paris, as the widow of Monsieur —, the jeweller, mentioning the horrid murder of my late husband as the occasion of it, as above.

I received it with great submission, and expressions of being infinitely obliged to his master, and of my showing myself on all occasions his highness's most obedient servant; and after giving my most humble duty to his highness, with the utmost acknowledgments of the obligation, &c., I went to a little cabinet, and taking out some money, which made a little sound in taking it out, offered to give him five pistoles.

He drew back, but with the greatest respect, and told me he humbly thanked me, but that he durst not take a farthing; that his highness would take it so ill of him, he was sure he would never see his face more; but that he would not fail to acquaint his highness what respect I had offered; and added, I assure you, madam, you are more in the good graces of my master, the Prince of —, than you are aware of; and I believe you will hear more of him.

Now I began to understand him, and resolved, if his highness did come again, he should see me under no disadvantages, if I could help it. I told him if his highness did me the honour to see me again, I hoped he would not let me be so surprised as I was before; that I would be glad to have some little notice of it, and would be obliged to him if he would procure it me. He told me he was very sure that when his highness intended to visit me he should be sent before to give me notice of it, and that he would give me as much warning of it as possible.

He came several times after this on the same errand, that is, about the settlement, the grant requiring several things yet to be done, for making it payable without going every time to the prince again for a fresh warrant. The particulars of this part I did not understand; but as soon as it was finished, which was above two months, the gentleman came one afternoon, and said his highness designed to visit me in the evening, but desired to be admitted without ceremony.

I prepared not my rooms only, but myself; and when he came in there was nobody appeared in the house but his gentleman and my maid Amy; and of her I bid the gentleman acquaint his highness that she was an English woman, that she did not understand a word of French, and that she was one also that might be trusted.

When he came into my room, I fell down at his feet before he could come to salute me, and with words that I had prepared, full of duty and respect, thanked him for his bounty and goodness to a poor desolate woman, oppressed under the weight of so terrible a disaster; and refused to rise till he would allow me the honour to kiss his hand.

Levez vous donc, says the prince, taking me in his arms, I design more favours for you than this trifle; and going on, he added, You shall for the future find a friend where you did not look for it, and I resolve to let you see how kind I can be to one who is to me the most agreeable creature on earth.

I was dressed in a kind of half mourning, had turned off my weeds, and my head, though I had yet no ribands or lace, was so dressed, as failed not to set me out with advantage enough, for I began to understand his meaning; and the prince professed I was the most beautiful creature on earth. And where have I lived, says he, and how ill have I been served, that I should never till now be showed the finest woman in France!

This was the way in all the world the most likely to break in upon my virtue, if I had been mistress of any; for I was now become the vainest creature upon earth, and particularly of my beauty, which, as other people admired, so I became every day more foolishly in love with myself than before.

He said some very kind things to me after this, and sat down with me for an hour or more, when getting up, and calling his gentleman by his name, he threw open the door: Au boir, says he; upon which his gentleman immediately brought up a little table covered with a fine damask cloth, the table no bigger than he could bring in his two hands, but upon it was set two decanters, one of champagne and the other of water, six silver plates, and a service of fine sweetmeats in fine china dishes, on a set of rings standing up about twenty inches high, one above another. Below was three roasted partridges and a quail. As soon as his gentleman had set it all down, he ordered him to withdraw. Now, says the prince, I intend to sup with you.

When he sent away his gentleman, I stood up and offered to wait on his highness, while he eat; but he positively refused, and told me, No, to-morrow you shall be the widow of Monsieur —, the jeweller, but to night you shall be my mistress; therefore sit here, says he, and eat with me, or I will get up and serve.

I would then have called up my woman Amy, but I thought that would not be proper neither; so I made my excuse, that since his highness would not let his own servant wait, I would not presume to let my woman come up; but if he would please to let me wait, it would be my honour to fill his highness's wine. But, as before, he would by no means allow me; so we sat and eat together.

Now, madam, says the prince, give me leave to lay aside my character ; let us talk together with the freedom of equals ; my quality sets me at a distance from you, and makes you ceremonious ; your beauty exalts you to more than an equality. I must then treat you as lovers do their mistresses, but I cannot speak the language ; it is enough to tell you how agreeable you are to me, how I am surprised at your beauty, and resolve to make you happy, and to be happy with you.

I knew not what to say to him a good while, but blushed, and, looking up towards him, said I was already made happy in the favour of a person of such rank, and had nothing to ask of his highness but that he would believe me infinitely obliged.

After he had eaten, he poured the sweetmeats into my lap ; and the wine being out, he called his gentleman again to take away the table, who, at first, only took the cloth, and the remains of what was to eat, away ; and, laying another cloth, set the table on one side of the room with a noble service of plate upon it, worth at least two hundred pistoles. Then, having set the two decanters again upon the table, filled as before, he withdrew ; for I found the fellow understood his business very well, and his lord's business too.

About half an hour after, the prince told me that I offered to wait a little before, that if I would now take the trouble he would give me leave to give him some wine ; so I went to the table, filled a glass of wine, and brought it to him on a fine salver, which the glasses stood on, and brought the bottle or decanter for water in my other hand, to mix as he thought fit.

He smiled, and bid me look on that salver, which I did, and admired it much, for it was a very fine one indeed. You may see, says he, I resolve to have more of your company, for my servant shall leave you that plate for my use. I told him I believed his highness would not take it ill that I was not furnished fit to entertain a person of his rank, and that I would take great care of it, and value myself infinitely upon the honour of his highness's visit.

It now began to grow late, and he began to take notice of it. But, says he, I cannot leave you ; have you not a spare lodging, for one night ? I told him I had but a homely lodging to entertain such a guest. He said something exceeding kind on that head, but not fit to repeat, adding, that my company would make him amends.

About midnight he sent his gentleman of an errand, after telling him aloud that he intended to stay here all night. In a little time his gentleman brought him a nightgown, slippers, two caps, a neckcloth, and shirt, which he gave me to carry into his chamber, and sent his man home; and then, turning to me, said I should do him the honour to be his chamberlain of the household and his dresser also. I smiled, and told him I would do myself the honour to wait on him upon all occasions.

About one in the morning, while his gentleman was yet with him, I begged leave to withdraw, supposing he would go to bed; but he took the hint, and said, I'm not going to bed yet, pray let me see you again.

I took this time to undress me, and to come in a new dress, which was, in a manner, une dishabille, but so fine, and all about me so clean and so agreeable, that he seemed surprised. I thought, says he, you could not have dressed to more advantage than you had done before; but now, says he, you charm me a thousand times more, if that be possible.

It is only a loose habit, my lord, said I, that I may the better wait on your highness. He pulls me to him; You are perfectly obliging, says he; and, sitting on the bed-side, says he, Now you shall be a princess, and know what it is to oblige the gratefulest man alive; and with that he took me in his arms, ... I can go no farther in the particulars of what passed at that time, but it ended in this, that, in short, I lay with him all night.

I have given you the whole detail of this story to lay it down as a black scheme of the way how unhappy women are ruined by great men; for though poverty and want is an irresistible temptation to the poor, vanity and great things are as irresistible to others. To be courted by a prince, and by a prince who was first a benefactor, then an admirer; to be called handsome, the finest woman in France, and to be treated as a woman fit for the bed of a prince: these are things a woman must have no vanity in her, nay, no corruption in her, that is not overcome by it; and my case was such, that, as before, I had enough of both.

I had now no poverty attending me; on the contrary, I was mistress of ten thousand pounds before the prince did anything for me. Had I been mistress of my resolution; had I been less obliging, and rejected the first attack, all had been safe; but my virtue was lost before, and the devil, who had found the way to break in upon me by one temptation, easily mastered me now by another; and I gave myself up to a person, who, though a man of high dignity, was yet the most tempting and obliging that ever I met with in my life.

I had the same particular to insist upon here with the prince that I had with my gentleman before. I hesitated much at consenting at first asking, but the prince told me princes did not court like other men; that they brought more powerful arguments; and he very prettily added, that they were sooner repulsed than other men, and ought to be sooner complied with; intimating, though very genteelly, that after a woman had positively refused him once, he could not, like other men, wait with importunities and stratagems, and laying long sieges; but as such men as he stormed warmly, so, if repulsed, they made no second attacks; and, indeed, it was but reasonable; for as it was below their rank to be long battering a woman's constancy, so they ran greater hazards in being exposed in their amours than other men did.

I took this for a satisfactory answer, and told his highness that I had the same thoughts in respect to the manner of his attacks; for that his person and his arguments were irresistible; that a person of his rank, and a munificence so unbounded, could not be withstood; that no virtue was proof against him, except such as was able too, to suffer martyrdom; that I thought it impossible I could be overcome, but that now I found it was impossible I should not be overcome; that so much goodness, joined with so much greatness, would have conquered a saint; and that I confess he had the victory over me, by a merit infinitely superior to the conquest he had made.

He made me a most obliging answer; told me abundance of fine things, which still flattered my vanity, till at last I began to have pride enough to believe him, and fancied myself a fit mistress for a prince.

As I had thus given the prince the last favour, and he had all the freedom with me that it was possible for me to grant, so he gave me leave to use as much freedom with him another way, and that was to have everything of him I thought fit to command; and yet I did not ask of him with an air of avarice, as if I was greedily making a penny of him, but I managed him with such art that he generally anticipated my demands. He only requested of me that I would not think of taking another house, as I had intimated to his highness that I intended, not thinking it good enough to receive his visits in; but he said my house was the most convenient that could possibly be found in all Paris for an amour, especially for him, having a way out into three streets, and not overlooked by any neighbours, so that he could pass and repass without observation; for one of the back ways opened into a narrow dark alley, which alley was a thoroughfare or passage out of one street into another; and any person that went in or out by the door had no more to do but to see that there was nobody following him in the alley before he went in at the door. This request I knew was reasonable, and therefore I assured him I would not change my dwelling, seeing his highness did not think it too mean for me to receive him in.

He also desired me that I would not take any more servants, or set up any equipage, at least for the present; for that it would then be immediately concluded I had been left very rich, and then I should be thronged with the impertinence of admirers, who would be attracted by the money, as well as by the beauty of a young widow, and he should be frequently interrupted in his visits; or that the world would conclude I was maintained by somebody, and would be indefatigable to find out the person; so that he should have spies peeping at him every time he went out or in, which it would be impossible to disappoint; and that he should presently have it talked over all the toilets in Paris that the Prince de — had got the jeweller's widow for a mistress.

This was too just to oppose, and I made no scruple to tell his highness, that since he had stooped so low as to make me his own, he ought to have all the satisfaction in the world, that I was all his own; that I would take all the measures he should please to direct me, to avoid the impertinent attacks of others; and, that if he thought fit, I would be wholly within doors, and have it given out that I was obliged to go to England to solicit my affairs there, after my husband's misfortune, and that I was not expected there again for at least a year or two. This he liked very well, only he said that he would by no means have me confined; that it would injure my health, and that I should then take a country-house in some village, a good way off of the city, where it should not be known who I was, and that he should be there sometimes to divert me.

I made no scruple of the confinement, and told his highness, no place could be a confinement where I had such a visitor, and so I put off the country-house, which would have been to remove myself farther from him, and have less of his company; so I made the house be, as it were, shut up. Amy, indeed, appeared, and when any of the neighbours and servants inquired, she answered, in broken French, that I was gone to England to look after my affairs, which presently went current through the streets about us. For you are to note, that the people of Paris, especially the women, are the most busy and impertinent inquirers into the conduct of their neighbours, especially that of a single woman, that are in the world, though there are no greater intriguers in the universe than themselves; and perhaps that may be the reason of it, for it is an old but a sure rule, that,

“When deep intrigues are close and shy,
The guilty are the first that spy.”

Thus his highness had the most easy, and yet the most undiscoverable access to me imaginable, and he seldom failed to come two or three nights in a week, and sometimes stayed two or three nights together. Once he told me he was resolved I should be weary of his company, and that he would learn to know what it was to be a prisoner; so he gave out among his servants that he was gone to ———, where he often went, a hunting, and that he should not return under a fortnight; and that fortnight he stayed wholly with me, and never went out of my doors.

Never woman in such a station, lived a fortnight in so complete a fulness of human delight; for to have the entire possession of one of the most accomplished princes in the world, and of the politest best-bred man; to converse with him all day, and as he professed, charm him all night; what could be more inexpressibly pleasing, and especially to a woman of a vast deal of pride, as I was?

To finish the felicity of this part, I must not forget that the devil had played a new game with me, and prevailed with me to satisfy myself with this amour, as a lawful thing; that a prince of such grandeur and majesty, so infinitely superior to me, and one who had made such an introduction by an unparalleled bounty, I could not resist; and therefore, that it was very lawful for me to do it, being at that time perfectly single, and unengaged to any other man, as I was, most certainly, by the unaccountable absence of my first husband, and the murder of my gentleman who went for my second.

It cannot be doubted but that I was the easier to persuade myself of the truth of such a doctrine as this, when it was so much for my ease, and for the repose of my mind, to have it be so.

"In things we wish, 'tis easy to deceive,
What we would have, we willingly believe."

Besides, I had no casuists to resolve this doubt; the same devil that put this into my head bade me go to any of the Romish clergy, and, under the pretence of confession, state the case exactly, and I should see they would either resolve it to be no sin at all, or absolve me upon the easiest penance. This I had a strong inclination to try, but I know not what scruple put me off of it, for I could never bring myself to like having to do with those priests; and though it was strange that I, who had thus prostituted my chastity, and given up all sense of virtue, in two such particular cases, living a life of open adultery, should scruple anything, yet so it was. I argued with myself that I could not be a cheat in anything that was esteemed sacred; that I could not be of one opinion, and then pretend myself to be of another; nor could I go to confession, who knew nothing of the manner of it, and should betray myself to the priest to be a Huguenot, and then might come into trouble; but, in short, though I was a whore, yet I was a protestant whore, and could not act as if I was popish, upon any account whatsoever.

But, I say, I satisfied myself with the surprising occasion, that, as it was all irresistible, so it was all lawful; for that Heaven would not suffer us to be punished for that which it was not possible for us to avoid; and with these absurdities I kept conscience from giving me any considerable disturbance in all this matter; and I was as perfectly easy as to the lawfulness of it, as if I had been married to the prince, and had had no other husband: so possible is it for us to roll ourselves up in wickedness, till we grow invulnerable by conscience; and that sentinel once dozed, sleeps fast, not to be awakened while the tide of pleasure continues to flow, or till something dark and dreadful brings us to ourselves again.

I have, I confess, wondered at the stupidity that my intellectual part was under all that while; what lethargic fumes dozed the soul; and how it was possible that I, who in the case before, where the temptation was many ways more forcible, and the arguments stronger, and more irresistible, was yet under a continued inquietude, on account of the wicked life I led, could now live in the most profound tranquillity, and with an uninterrupted peace, nay, even rising up to satisfaction and joy, and yet in a more palpable state of adultery than before; for before, my gentleman, who called me wife, had the pretence of his wife being parted from him, refusing to do the duty of her office as a wife to him. As for me, my circumstances were the same; but as for the prince, as he had a fine and extraordinary lady, or princess, of his own, so he had had two or three mistresses more besides me, and made no scruple of it at all.

However, I say, as to my own part, I enjoyed myself in perfect tranquillity; and as the prince was the only deity I worshipped, so I was really his idol; and however it was with his princess, I assure you his other mistresses found a sensible difference, and though they could never find me out, yet I had good intelligence that they guessed very well that their lord had got some new favourite that robbed them of his company, and, perhaps, of some of his usual bounty too. And now I must mention the sacrifices he made to his idol, and they were not a few, I assure you.

As he loved like a prince, so he rewarded like a prince, for though he declined my making a figure, as above, he let me see that he was above doing it for the saving the expense of it, and so he told me, and that he would make it up in other things. First of all, he sent me a toilet, with all the appurtenances of silver, even so much as the frame of the table; and then for the house, he gave me the table, or sideboard of plate I mentioned above, with all things belonging to it, of massy silver, so that, in short, I could not for my life study to ask him for anything of plate which I had not.

He could, then, accommodate me in nothing more but jewels and clothes, or money for clothes; he sent his gentleman to the mercer's, and bought me a suit, or whole piece, of the finest brocaded silk, figured with gold, and another with silver, and another of crimson ; so that I had three suits of clothes, such as the Queen of France would not have disdained to have worn at that time ; yet I went out nowhere ; but as those were for me to put on when I went out of mourning, I dressed myself in them, one after another, always when his highness came to see me.

I had no less than five several morning dresses besides these, so that I need never be seen twice in the same dress ; to these he added several parcels of fine linen and of lace, so much that I had no room to ask for more, or, indeed, for so much.

I took the liberty once, in our freedoms, to tell him he was too bountiful, and that I was too chargeable to him for a mistress, and that I would be his faithful servant at less expense to him ; and that he not only left me no room to ask him for anything, but that he supplied me with such a profusion of good things, that I scarce could wear them, or use them, unless I kept a great equipage, which he knew was no way convenient for him or for me ; he smiled, and took me in his arms, and told me he was resolved, while I was his, I should never be able to ask him for anything, but that he would be daily asking new favours of me.

After we were up (for this conference was in bed), he desired I would dress me in the best suit of clothes I had. It was a day or two after the three suits were made and brought home. I told him, if he pleased, I would rather dress me in that suit which I knew he liked best. He asked me how I could know which he would like best before he had seen them. I told him I would presume for once to guess at his fancy by my own ; so I went away and dressed me in the second suit, brocaded with silver, and returned in full dress, with a suit of lace upon my head, which would have been worth in England two hundred pounds sterling ; and I was every way set out as well as Amy could dress me, who was a very genteel dresser too. In this figure I came to him, out of my dressing-room, which opened with folding-doors into his bedchamber.

He sat as one astonished a good while, looking at me, without speaking a word, till I came quite up to him, kneeled on one knee to him, and almost, whether he would or no, kissed his hand. He took me up, and stood up himself, but was surprised when, taking me in his arms, he perceived tears to run down my cheeks. My dear, says he, aloud, what mean these tears? My lord, said I, after some little check, for I could not speak presently, I beseech you to believe me, they are not tears of sorrow, but tears of joy. It is impossible for me to see myself snatched from the misery I was fallen into, and at once to be in the arms of a prince of such goodness, such immense bounty, and be treated in such a manner; it is not possible, my lord, said I, to contain the satisfaction of it; and it will break out in an excess in some measure proportioned to your immense bounty, and to the affection which your highness treats me with, who am so infinitely below you.

It would look a little too much like a romance, here to repeat all the kind things he said to me on that occasion, but I can't omit one passage; as he saw the tears drop down my cheek, he pulls out a fine cambric handkerchief, and was going to wipe the tears off, but checked his hand, as if he was afraid to deface something; I say, he checked his hand, and tossed the handkerchief to me to do it myself. I took the hint immediately, and with a kind of pleasant disdain, How, my lord, said I, have you kissed me so often, and don't you know whether I am painted or not? Pray let your highness satisfy yourself that you have no cheats put upon you; for once let me be vain enough to say, I have not deceived you with false colours. With this, I put a handkerchief into his hand, and taking his hand into mine, I made him wipe my face so hard that he was unwilling to do it, for fear of hurting me.

He appeared surprised more than ever, and swore, which was the first time that I had heard him swear from my first knowing him, that he could not have believed there was any such skin without paint in the world. Well, my lord, said I, your highness shall have a farther demonstration than this, as to that which you are pleased to accept for beauty, that it is the mere work of nature; and with that I stepped to the door, and rung a little bell for my woman Amy, and bade her bring me a cup full of hot water, which she did; and when it was come, I desired his highness to feel if it was warm, which he did, and I immediately washed my face all over with it before him. This was, indeed, more than satisfaction, that is to say, than believing, for it was an undeniable demonstration, and he kissed my cheeks and breasts a thousand times, with expressions of the greatest surprise imaginable.

Nor was I a very indifferent figure as to shape ; though I had had two children by my gentleman, and six by my true husband, I say I was no despicable shape ; and my prince (I must be allowed the vanity to call him so), was taking his view of me as I walked from one end of the room to the other. At last he leads me to the darkest part of the room, and standing behind me, badè me hold up my head, when putting both his hands round my neck, as if he was spanning my neck, to see how small it was, for it was long and small, he held my neck so long and so hard in his hand, that I complained he hurt me a little. What he did it for, I knew not, nor had I the least suspicion but that he was spanning my neck ; but when I said he hurt me, he seemed to let go, and in half a minute more, led me to a pier-glass, and behold I saw my neck clasped with a fine necklace of diamonds ; whereas I felt no mote what he was doing, than if he had really done nothing at all, nor did I suspect it in the least. If I had an ounce of blood in me that did not fly up into my face, neck, and breasts, it must be from some interruption in the vessels. I was all on fire with the sight, and began to wonder what it was that was coming to me.

However, to let him see that I was not unqualified to receive benefits, I turned about ; My lord, says I, your highness is resolved to conquer, by your bounty, the very gratitude of your servants ; you will leave no room for anything but thanks, and make those thanks useless too, by their bearing no proportion to the occasion.

I love, child, says he, to see everything suitable. A fine gown and petticoat, a fine laced head, a fine face and neck, and no necklace, would not have made the object perfect. But why that blush, my dear ? says the prince. My lord, said I, all your gifts call for blushes, but above all, I blush to receive what I am so ill able to merit, and may become so ill also.

Thus far I am a standing mark of the weakness of great men in their vice, that value not squandering away immense wealth upon the most worthless creatures ; or, to sum it up in a word, they raise the value of the object which they pretend to pitch upon by their fancy. I say, raise the value of it at their own expense; give vast presents for a ruinous favour, which is so far from being equal to the price, that nothing will at last prove more absurd than the cost men are at to purchase their own destruction.

I could not, in the height of all this fine doings, I say, I could not be without some just reflection, though conscience was, as I said, dumb, as to any disturbance it gave me in my wickedness. My vanity was fed up to such a height, that I had no room to give way to such reflections. But I could not but sometimes look back with astonishment at the folly of men of quality, who, immense in their bounty as in their wealth, give to a profusion and without bounds to the most scandalous of our sex, for granting them the liberty of abusing themselves and ruining both.

I, that knew what this carcase of mine had been but a few years before; how overwhelmed with grief, drowned in tears, frightened with the prospect of beggary, and surrounded with rags and fatherless children; that was pawning and selling the rags that covered me, for a dinner, and sat on the ground despairing of help, and expecting to be starved, till my children were snatched from me to be kept by the parish; I, that was after this a whore for bread, and, abandoning conscience and virtue, lived with another woman's husband; I, that was despised by all my relations, and my husband's too; I, that was left so entirely desolate, friendless, and helpless, that I knew not how to get the least help to keep me from starving; that I should be caressed by a prince, for the honour of having the scandalous use of my prostituted body, common before to his inferiors, and perhaps would not have denied one of his footmen but a little while before, if I could have got my bread by it.

I say, I could not but reflect upon the brutality and blindness of mankind; that because nature had given me a good skin and some agreeable features, should suffer that beauty to be such a bait to appetite, as to do such sordid unaccountable things to obtain the possession of it.

It is for this reason that I have so largely set down the particulars of the caresses I was treated with by the jeweller, and also by this prince. Not to make the story an incentive to the vice, which I am now such a sorrowful penitent for being guilty of (God forbid any should make so vile a use of so good a design), but to draw the just picture of a man enslaved to the rage of his vicious appetite ; how he defaces the image of God in his soul ; dethrones his reason, causes conscience to abdicate the possession, and exalts sense into the vacant throne ; how he deposes the man and exalts the brute.

Oh ! could we hear how the reproaches this great man afterwards loaded himself with, when he grew weary of this admired creature, and became sick of his vice ! how profitable would the report of them be to the reader of this story ; but had he himself also known the dirty history of my actings upon the stage of life, that little time I had been in the world, how much more severe would those reproaches have been upon himself : but I shall come to this again.

I lived in this gay sort of retirement almost three years, in which time no amour of such a kind, sure, was ever carried up so high. The prince knew no bounds to his munificence ; he could give me nothing either for my wearing, or using, or eating, or drinking, more than he had done from the beginning.

His presents were after that in gold, and very frequent and large, often a hundred pistoles, never less than fifty at a time ; and I must do myself the justice, that I seemed rather backward to receive, than craving and encroaching ; not that I had not an avaricious temper, nor was it that I did not foresee that this was my harvest, in which I was to gather up, and that it would not last long ; but it was that really his bounty always anticipated my expectations, and even my wishes ; and he gave me money so fast, that he rather poured it in upon me than left me room to ask it ; so that before I could spend fifty pistoles, I had always a hundred to make it up.

After I had been near a year and a half in his arms as above, or thereabouts, I proved with child. I did not take any notice of it to him till I was satisfied that I was not deceived ; when one morning early, when we were in bed together, I said to him, My lord, I doubt your highness never gives yourself leave to think what the case should be, if I should have the honour to be with child by you. Why, my dear, says he, we are able to keep it if such a thing should happen : I hope you are not concerned about that. No, my lord, said I, I should think myself very happy if I could bring your highness a son ; I should hope to see him a lieutenant-general of the king's armies by the interest of his father, and by his own merit. Assure yourself, child, says he, if it should be so, I will not refuse owning him for my son, though it be, as they call it, a natural son; and shall never slight or neglect him, for the sake of his mother. Then he began to importune me to know if it was so, but I positively denied it so long, till at last I was able to give him the satisfaction of knowing it himself by the motion of the child within me.

He professed himself overjoyed at the discovery, but told me that now it was absolutely necessary for me to quit the confinement which, he said, I had suffered for his sake, and to take a house somewhere in the country, in order for health as well as for privacy, against my lying-in. This was quite out of my way, but the prince, who was a man of pleasure, had, it seems, several retreats of this kind, which he had made use of, I suppose, upon like occasions; and so leaving it, as it were, to his gentleman, he provided a very convenient house, about four miles south of Paris, at the village of —, where I had very agreeable lodgings, good gardens, and all things very easy to my content; but one thing did not please me at all, viz., that an old woman was provided, and put into the house to furnish everything necessary to my lying-in, and to assist at my travail.

I did not like this old woman at all; she looked so like a spy upon me, or (as sometimes I was frightened to imagine) like one set privately to despatch me out of the world, as might best suit with the circumstance of my lying-in; and when his highness came the next time to see me, which was not many days, I expostulated a little on the subject of the old woman; and by the management of my tongue, as well as by the strength of reasoning, I convinced him that it would not be at all convenient; that it would be the greater risk on his side; and at first or last it would certainly expose him and me also. I assured him that my servant, being an English-woman, never knew to that hour who his highness was; that I always called him the Count de Clerac, and that she knew nothing else of him, nor ever should; that if he would give me leave to choose proper persons for my use, it should be so ordered, that not one of them should know who he was, or perhaps ever see his face; and that for the reality of the child that should be born, his highness, who had alone been at the first of it, should, if he pleased, be present in the room all the time, so that he would need no witnesses on that account.

This discourse fully satisfied him, so that he ordered his gentleman to dismiss the old woman the same day; and without any difficulty I sent my maid Amy to Calais, and thence to Dover, where she got an English midwife and an English nurse, to come over on purpose, to attend an English lady of quality, as they styled me, for four months certain.

The midwife, Amy had agreed to pay a hundred guineas to, and bear her charges to Paris, and back again to Dover. The poor woman that was to be my nurse had twenty pounds, and the same terms for charges as the other.

I was very easy when Amy returned, and the more because she brought with the midwife a good motherly sort of woman, who was to be her assistant, and would be very helpful on occasion; and bespoke a man midwife at Paris too, if there should be any necessity for his help. Having thus made provision for everything, the count, for so we all called him in public, came as often to see me as I could expect, and continued exceeding kind, as he had always been. One day, conversing together upon the subject of my being with child, I told him how all things were in order, but that I had a strange apprehension that I should die with that child. He smiled, So all the ladies say, my dear, says he, when they are with child. Well however, my lord, said I, it is but just that care should be taken that what you have bestowed in your excess of bounty upon me should not be lost; and upon this I pulled a paper out of my bosom, folded up, but not sealed, and I read it to him, wherein I had left order, that all the plate and jewels, and fine furniture which his highness had given me, should be restored to him by my women, and the keys be immediately delivered to his gentleman in case of disaster.

Then I recommended my woman, Amy, to his favour for a hundred pistoles, on condition she gave the keys up as above to his gentleman, and his gentleman's receipt for them. When he saw this, My dear child, said he (and took me in his arms), what! have you been making your will and disposing of your effects? Pray, who do you make your universal heir? So far as to do justice to your highness, in case of mortality, I have, my lord, said I, and who should I dispose the valuable things to, which I have had from your hand as pledges of your favour and testimonies of your bounty, but to the giver of them? If the child should live, your highness will, I don't question, act like yourself in that part, and I shall have the utmost satisfaction that it will be well used by your direction.

I could see he took this very well. I have forsaken all the ladies in Paris, says he, for you, and I have lived every day since I knew you to see that you know how to merit all that a man of honour can do for you. Be easy, child; I hope you shall not die, and all you have is your own, to do what with it you please.

I was then within about two months of my time, and that soon wore off. When I found my time was come, it fell out very happily that he was in the house, and I entreated he would continue a few hours in the house, which he agreed to. They called his highness to come into the room, if he pleased, as I had offered and as I desired him; and I sent word I would make as few cries as possible to prevent disturbing him. He came into the room once, and called to me to be of good courage, it would soon be over, and then he withdrew again; and in about half an hour more Amy carried him the news that I was delivered, and had brought him a charming boy. He gave her ten pistoles for her news, stayed till they had adjusted things about me, and then came into the room again, cheered me and spoke kindly to me, and looked on the child, then withdrew, and came again the next day to visit me.

Since this, and when I have looked back upon these things with eyes unpossessed with crime, when the wicked part has appeared in its clearer light, and I have seen it in its own natural colours, when no more blinded with the glittering appearances which at that time deluded me, and as in like cases, if I may guess at others by myself, too much possessed the mind; I say, since this, I have often wondered with what pleasure or satisfaction the prince could look upon the poor innocent infant, which though his own, and that he might that way have some attachment in his affections to it, yet must always afterwards be a remembrancer to him of his most early crime, and, which was worse, must bear upon itself, unmerited, an eternal mark of infamy, which should be spoken of, upon all occasions, to its reproach, from the folly of its father and wickedness of its mother.

Great men are indeed delivered from the burthen of their natural children, or bastards, as to their maintenance. This is the main affliction in other cases, where there is not substance sufficient without breaking into the fortunes of the family. In those cases, either a man's legitimate children suffer, which is very unnatural, or the unfortunate mother of that illegitimate birth has a dreadful affliction, either of being turned off with her child, and be left to starve, &c., or of seeing the poor infant packed off with a piece of money to some of those she-butchers, who take children off their hands, as 'tis called, that is to say, starve 'em, and, in a word, murder 'em.

Great men, I say, are delivered from this burthen, because they are always furnished to supply the expense of their out-of-the-way offspring, by making little assignments upon the bank of Lyons, or the town-house of Paris, and settling those sums, to be received for the maintenance of such expense as they see cause.

Thus, in the case of this child of mine, while he and I conversed, there was no need to make any appointment as an appanage or maintenance for the child or its nurse, for he supplied me more than sufficiently for all those things; but afterwards, when time, and a particular circumstance, put an end to our conversing together (as such things always meet with a period, and generally break off abruptly), I say, after that, I found he appointed the children a settled allowance, by an assignment of annual rent upon the bank of Lyons, which was sufficient for bringing them handsomely, though privately, up in the world, and that not in a manner unworthy of their father's blood, though I came to be sunk and forgotten in the case; nor did the children ever know anything of their mother to this day, other than as you may have an account hereafter.

But to look back to the particular observation I was making, which I hope may be of use to those who read my story, I say it was something wonderful to me to see this person so exceedingly delighted at the birth of this child, and so pleased with it; for he would sit and look at it, and with an air of seriousness sometimes, a great while together, and particularly, I observed, he loved to look at it when it was asleep.

It was indeed a lovely, charming child, and had a certain vivacity in its countenance that is far from being common to all children so young; and he would often say to me, that he believed there was something extraordinary in the child, and he did not doubt but he would come to be a great man.

I could never hear him say so, but though secretly it pleased me, yet it so closely touched me another way that I could not refrain sighing, and sometimes tears; and one time in particular it so affected me that I could not conceal it from him; but when he saw tears run down my face, there was no concealing the occasion from him; he was too importunate to be denied in a thing of that moment, so I frankly answered, It sensibly affects me, my lord, said I, that whatever the merit of this little creature may be, he must always have a bend on his arms. The disaster of his birth will be always, not a blot only to his honour; but a bar to his fortunes in the world. Our affection will be ever his affliction, and his mother's crime be the son's reproach; the blot can never be wiped out by the most glorious actions; nay, if it lives to raise a family, said I, the infamy must descend even to its innocent posterity.

He took the thought, and sometimes told me afterwards that it made a deeper impression on him than he discovered to me at that time; but for the present he put it off with telling me these things could not be helped; that they served for a spur to the spirits of brave men, inspired them with the principles of gallantry, and prompted them to brave actions; that though it might be true that the mention of illegitimacy might attend the name, yet that personal virtue placed a man of honour above the reproach of his birth; that, as he had no share in the offence, he would have no concern at the blot; when, having by his own merit placed himself out of the reach of scandal, his fame should drown the memory of his beginning.

That as it was usual for men of quality to make such little escapes, so the number of their natural children were so great, and they generally took such good care of their education, that some of the greatest men in the world had a bend in their coats of arms, and that it was of no consequence to them, especially when their fame began to rise upon the basis of their acquired merit; and upon this he began to reckon up to me some of the greatest families in France and in England also.

This carried off our discourse for a time ; but I went farther with him once, removing the discourse from the part attending our children to the reproach which those children would be apt to throw upon us, their originals ; and, when speaking a little too feelingly on the subject, he began to receive the impression a little deeper than I wished he had done. At last he told me I had almost acted the confessor to him ; that I might, perhaps, preach a more dangerous doctrine to him than we should either of us like, or than I was aware of ; For, my dear, says he, if once we come to talk of repentance we must talk of parting.

If tears were in my eyes before, they flowed too fast now to be restrained, and I gave him but too much satisfaction by my looks that I had yet no reflections upon my mind strong enough to go that length, and that I could no more think of parting than he could.

He said a great many kind things, which were great, like himself ; and, extenuating our crime, intimated to me that he could no more part with me than I could with him ; so we both, as I may say, even against our light, and against our conviction, concluded to sin on ; indeed, his affection to the child was one great tie to him, for he was extremely fond of it.

This child lived to be a considerable man. He was first an officer of the Garde du Corps of France, and afterwards colonel of a regiment of dragoons in Italy ; and on many extraordinary occasions showed that he was not unworthy such a father, but many ways deserving a legitimate birth, and a better mother ; of which hereafter.

I think I may say now that I lived indeed like a queen ; or, if you will have me confess that my condition had still the reproach of a whore, I may say I was, sure, the queen of whores ; for no woman was ever more valued or more caressed by a person of such quality only in the station of a mistress. I had, indeed, one deficiency which women in such circumstances seldom are chargeable with ; namely, I craved nothing of him ; I never asked him for anything in my life, nor suffered myself to be made use of, as is too much the custom of mistresses, to ask favours for others. His bounty always prevented me in the first, and my strict concealing myself, in the last, which was no less to my convenience than his.

The only favour I ever asked of him was for his gentleman, who he had all along intrusted with the secret of our affair, and who had once so much offended him by some omissions in his duty that he found it very hard to make his peace. He came and laid his case before my woman Amy, and begged her to speak to me to intercede for him, which I did, and on my account he was received again and pardoned, for which the grateful dog requited me by getting to bed to his benefactress, Amy, at which I was very angry; but Amy generously acknowledged that it was her fault as much as his; that she loved the fellow so much that she believed if he had not asked her she should have asked him; I say this pacified me, and I only obtained of her that she should not let him know that I knew it.

I might have interspersed this part of my story with a great many pleasant parts and discourses which happened between my maid Amy and I, but I omit them on account of my own story, which has been so extraordinary. However, I must mention something as to Amy and her gentleman.

I inquired of Amy upon what terms they came to be so intimate, but Amy seemed backward to explain herself. I did not care to press her upon a question of that nature, knowing that she might have answered my question with a question, and have said, Why, how did I and the prince come to be so intimate? so I left off farther inquiring into it, till, after some time, she told it me all freely of her own accord, which, to cut it short, amounted to no more than this, that, like mistress like maid, as they had many leisure hours together below, while they waited respectively when his lord and I were together above; I say, they could hardly avoid the usual question one to another, namely, why might not they do the same thing below that we did above?

On that account, indeed, as I said above, I could not find in my heart to be angry with Amy. I was, indeed, afraid the girl would have been with child too, but that did not happen, and so there was no hurt done; for Amy had been hanselled before, as well as her mistress, and by the same party too, as you have heard.

After I was up again, and my child provided with a good nurse, and, withal, winter coming on, it was proper to think of coming to Paris again, which I did; but as I had now a coach and horses, and some servants to attend me, by my lord's allowance, I took the liberty to have them come to Paris sometimes, and so to take a tour into the garden of the Thuilleries, and the other pleasant places of the city. It happened one day that my prince (if I may call him so), had a mind to give me some diversion, and to take the air with me; but, that he might do it and not be publicly known, he comes to me in a coach of the Count de —, a great officer of the court, attended by his liveries also; so that, in a word, it was impossible to guess by the equipage who I was, or who I belonged to; also, that I might be the more effectually concealed, he ordered me to be taken up at a mantua-maker's house, where he sometimes came, whether upon other amours or not was no business of mine to inquire. I knew nothing whither he intended to carry me; but when he was in the coach with me, he told me he had ordered his servants to go to court with me, and he would show me some of the beau monde. I told him I cared not where I went while I had the honour to have him with me; so he carried me to the fine palace of Meudon, where the dauphin then was, and where he had some particular intimacy with one of the dauphin's domestics, who procured a retreat for me in his lodgings while we stayed there, which was three or four days.

While I was there, the king happened to come thither from Versailles, and making but a short stay, visited madame the dauphiness, who was then living. The prince was here incognito, only because of his being with me, and, therefore, when he heard that the king was in the gardens, he kept close within the lodgings; but the gentleman in whose lodgings we were, with his lady and several others, went out to see the king, and I had the honour to be asked to go with them.

After we had seen the king, who did not stay long in the gardens, we walked up the broad terrace, and, crossing the hall towards the great staircase, I had a sight which confounded me at once, as I doubt not it would have done to any woman in the world. The horseguards, or, what they call there, the gens d'armes, had upon some occasion, been either upon duty, or been reviewed, or something (I did not understand that part) was the matter, that occasioned their being there, I know not what; but, walking in the guard-chamber, and with his jack-boots on, and the whole habit of the troop, as it is worn when our horse-guards are upon duty, as they call it, at St. James's Park; I say, there, to my inexpressible confusion, I saw Mr. —, my first husband, the brewer.

I could not be deceived; I passed so near him that I almost brushed him with my clothes, and looked him full in the face, but having my fan before my face, so that he could not know me. However, I knew him perfectly well, and I heard him speak, which was a second way of knowing him. Besides being, you may be sure, astonished and surprised at such a sight, I turned about after I had passed him some steps, and, pretending to ask the lady that was with me some questions, I stood as if I had viewed the great hall, the outer guard-chamber, and some things; but I did it to take a full view of his dress, that I might farther inform myself.

While I stood thus amusing the lady that was with me with questions, he walked, talking with another man of the same cloth, back again, just by me; and to my particular satisfaction, or dissatisfaction, take it which way you will, I heard him speak English, the other being, it seems, an Englishman.

I then asked the lady some other questions: Pray, madam, says I, what are these troopers here; are they the king's guards? No, says she, they are the gens d'armes; a small detachment of them, I suppose, attended the king to-day, but they are not his majesty's ordinary guard. Another lady that was with her said, No, madam, it seems that is not the case; for I heard them saying, the gens d'armes were here to-day by special order, some of them being to march towards the Rhine, and these attend for orders; but they go back to-morrow to Orleans, where they are expected.

This satisfied me in part, but I found means after this to inquire whose particular troop it was that the gentlemen that were here belonged to; and with that I heard they would all be at Paris the week after.

Two days after this we returned for Paris, when I took occasion to speak to my lord, that I heard the gens d'armes were to be in the city the next week, and that I should be charmed with seeing them march if they came in a body. He was so obliging in such things that I need but just name a thing of that kind and it was done; so he ordered his gentleman (I should now call him Amy's gentleman) to get me a place in a certain house, where I might see them march

As he did not appear with me on this occasion, so I had the liberty of taking my woman, Amy, with me, and stood where we were very well accommodated for the observation which I was to make. I told Amy what I had seen, and she was as forward to make the discovery as I was to have her, and almost as much surprised at the thing itself. In a word, the gens d'armes entered the city, as was expected, and made a most glorious show indeed, being new clothed and armed, and being to have their standards blessed by the Archbishop of Paris; on this occasion they indeed looked very gay, and as they marched very leisurely, I had time to take as critical a view, and make as nice a search among them as I pleased. Here, in a particular rank, eminent for one monstrous-sized man on the right, here, I say, I saw my gentleman again, and a very handsome jolly fellow he was, as any in the troop, though not so monstrous large as that great one I speak of, who, it seems, was, however, a gentleman of a good family in Gascoigne, and was called the giant of Gascoigne.

It was a kind of a good fortune to us, among the other circumstances of it, that something caused the troops to halt in their march, a little before that particular rank came right against that window which I stood in, so that then we had occasion to take our full view of him, at a small distance, and so as not to doubt of his being the same person.

Amy, who thought she might, on many accounts, venture with more safety to be particular than I could, asked her gentleman how a particular man, who she saw there among the gens d'armes, might be inquired after and found out; she having seen an Englishman riding there which was supposed to be dead in England for several years before she came out of London, and that his wife had married again. It was a question the gentleman did not well understand how to answer; but another person that stood by told her if she would tell him the gentleman's name, he would endeavour to find him out for her, and asked jestingly, if he was her lover? Amy put that off with a laugh, but still continued her inquiry, and in such a manner as the gentleman easily perceived she was in earnest, so he left bantering, and asked her in what part of the troop he rode. She foolishly told him his name, which she should not have done; and pointing to the cornet that troop carried, which was not then quite out of sight, she let him easily know whereabouts he rode, only she could not name the captain. However, he gave her such directions afterwards, that, in short, Amy, who was an indefatigable girl found him out. It seems he had not changed his name, not supposing any inquiry would be made after him here ; but, I say, Amy found him out, and went boldly to his quarters, asked for him, and he came out to her immediately.

I believe I was not more confounded at my first seeing him at Meudon than he was at seeing Amy. He started, and turned pale as death ; Amy believed if he had seen her at first, in any convenient place for so villainous a purpose, he would have murdered her.

But he started, as I say above, and asked in English, with an admiration, What are you ? Sir, says she, don't you know me ? Yes, says he, I knew you when you were alive, but what are you now, whether ghost or substance, I know not. Be not afraid, sir, of that, says Amy, I am the same Amy that I was in your service, and do not speak to you now for any hurt, but that I saw you accidentally yesterday ride among the soldiers, I thought you might be glad to hear from your friends at London. Well, Amy, says he, then (having a little recovered himself), how does everybody do ? What ! is your mistress here ? Thus they begun :

AMY. My mistress, sir, alas ! not the mistress you mean ; poor gentlewoman, you left her in a sad condition.

GENT. Why that's true, Amy, but it could not be helped ; I was in a sad condition myself.

AMY. I believe so, indeed, sir, or else you had not gone away as you did ; for it was a very terrible condition you left them all in, that I must say.

GENT. What did they do after I was gone ?

AMY. Do, sir ! very miserably you may be sure ; how could it be otherwise ?

GENT. Well, that's true indeed ; but you may tell me, Amy, what became of them, if you please ; for though I went so away, it was not because I did not love them all very well, but because I could not bear to see the poverty that was coming upon them, and which it was not in my power to help ; what could I do ?

AMY. Nay, I believe so, indeed, and I have heard my mistress say, many times, she did not doubt but your affliction was as great as her's, almost, wherever you were.

GENT. Why, did she believe I was alive, then?

AMY. Yes, sir, she always said she believed you were alive, because she thought she should have heard something of you if you had been dead.

GENT. Ay, ay, my perplexity was very great, indeed, or else I had never gone away.

AMY. It was very cruel though to the poor lady, sir, my mistress; she almost broke her heart for you at first, for fear of what might befall you, and at last because she could not hear from you.

GENT. Alas! Amy, what could I do? Things were driven to the last extremity before I went; I could have done nothing but help starve them all if I had stayed; and besides, I could not bear to see it.

AMY. You know, sir, I can say little to what passed before, but I am a melancholy witness to the sad distresses of my poor mistress as long as I stayed with her, and which would grieve your heart to hear them.

[Here she tells my whole story to the time that the parish took off one of my children, and which she perceived very much affected him; and he shook his head, and said some things very bitter when he heard of the cruelty of his own relations to me.]

GENT. Well, Amy, I have heard enough so far, what did she do afterwards?

AMY. I can't give you any farther account, sir; my mistress would not let me stay with her any longer; she said she could neither pay me nor subsist me. I told her I would serve her without any wages, but I could not live without victuals, you know; so I was forced to leave her, poor lady, sore against my will, and I heard afterwards, that the landlord seized her goods, so she was, I suppose, turned out of doors: for as I went by the door, about a month after, I saw the house shut up; and, about a fortnight after that, I found there were workmen at work, fitting it up, as I suppose, for a new tenant; but none of the neighbours could tell me what was become of my poor mistress, only that they said she was so poor that it was next to begging; that some of the neighbouring gentlefolks had relieved her, or that else she must have starved.

Then she went on, and told him that after that they never heard any more of [me] her mistress, but that she had been seen once or twice in the city very shabby, and poor in clothes, and it was thought she worked with her needle for her bread.

All this the jade said with so much cunning, and managed and humoured it so well, and wiped her eyes and cried so artificially, that he took it all as it was intended he should, and once or twice she saw tears in his eyes too. He told her it was a moving, melancholy story, and it had almost broke his heart at first, but that he was driven to the last extremity, and could do nothing but stay and see them all starve, which he could not bear the thoughts of, but should have pistolled himself if any such thing had happened while he was there; that he left [me] his wife, all the money he had in the world but 25*l.*, which was as little as he could take with him to seek his fortune in the world. He could not doubt but that his relations, seeing they were all rich, would have taken the poor children off, and not let them come to the parish; and that his wife was young and handsome, and he thought might marry again, perhaps, to her advantage; and for that very reason he never wrote to her, or let her know he was alive, that she might in a reasonable term of years marry, and perhaps mend her fortunes; that he resolved never to claim her, because he should rejoice to hear that she had settled to her mind; and that he wished there had been a law made to empower a woman to marry if her husband was not heard of in so long a time; which time, he thought, should not be above four year, which was long enough to send word in to a wife or family from any part of the world.

Amy said she could say nothing to that, but this, that she was satisfied her mistress would marry nobody unless she had certain intelligence that he had been dead from somebody that saw him buried. But, alas, says Amy, my mistress was reduced to such dismal circumstances that nobody would be so foolish to think of her, unless it had been somebody to go a begging with her.

Amy, then, seeing him so perfectly deluded, made a long and lamentable outcry how she had been deluded away to marry a poor footman; For he is no worse or better, says she, though he calls himself a lord's gentleman; and here, says Amy, he has dragged me over into a strange country to make a beggar of me ; and then she falls a howling again, and snivelling, which, by the way, was all hypocrisy, but acted so to the life as perfectly deceived him, and he gave entire credit to every word of it.

Why, Amy, says he, you are very well dressed, you don't look as if you were in danger of being a beggar. Ay, hang 'em, says Amy, they love to have fine clothes here, if they have never a sm—k under them ; but I love to have money in cash, rather than a chest full of fine clothes. Besides, sir, says she, most of the clothes I have were given me in the last place I had, when I went away from my mistress.

Upon the whole of the discourse, Amy got out of him what condition he was in, and how he lived, upon her promise to him that if ever she came to England, and should see her old mistress, she should not let her know that he was alive. Alas ! sir, says Amy, I may never come to see England again as long as I live, and if I should, it would be ten thousand to one whether I shall see my old mistress, for how should I know which way to look for her, or what part of England she may be in, not I, says she ; I don't so much as know how to inquire for her ; and if I should, says Amy, ever be so happy as to see her, I would not do her so much mischief as to tell her where you were, sir, unless she was in a condition to help herself and you too. This farther deluded him, and made him entirely open in his conversing with her. As to his own circumstances, he told her she saw him in the highest preferment he had arrived to, or was ever like to arrive to ; for having no friends or acquaintance in France, and which was worse, no money, he never expected to rise ; that he could have been made a lieutenant to a troop of light horse but the week before, by the favour of an officer in the gens d'armes who was his friend ; but that he must have found eight thousand livres to have paid for it, to the gentleman who possessed it, and had leave given him to sell. But where could I get eight thousand livres, says he, that have never been master of five hundred livres ready money at a time, since I came into France.

O dear ! sir, says Amy, I am very sorry to hear you say so ; I fancy if you once got up to some preferment, you would think of my old mistress again, and do something for her ; poor lady, says Amy, she wants it to be sure ; and then she falls a crying again ; it is a sad thing indeed, says she, that you should be so hard put to it for money, when you had got a friend to recommend you, and should lose it for want of money. Ay, so it was, Amy, indeed, says he; but what can a stranger do that has neither money or friends? Here Amy puts in again on my account: Well, says she, my poor mistress has had the loss, though she knows nothing of it. O dear, how happy it would have been; to be sure, sir, you would have helped her all you could. Ay, says he, Amy, so I would with all my heart; and even as I am, I would send her some relief, if I thought she wanted it; only that then letting her know I was alive might do her some prejudice, in case of her settling, or marrying anybody.

Alas, says Amy, marry! who will marry her in the poor condition she is in? And so their discourse ended for that time.

All this was mere talk on both sides, and words of course; for on farther inquiry, Amy found that he had no such offer of a lieutenant's commission, or anything like it; and that he rambled in his discourse from one thing to another; but of that in its place.

You may be sure that this discourse, as Amy at first related it, was moving to the last degree upon me; and I was once going to have sent him the eight thousand livres to purchase the commission he had spoken of; but as I knew his character better than anybody, I was willing to search a little farther into it; and so I set Amy to inquire of some other of the troop, to see what character he had, and whether there was anything in the story of a lieutenant's commission or no.

But Amy soon came to a better understanding of him, for she presently learnt that he had a most scoundrel character; that there was nothing of weight in anything he said; but that he was in short a mere sharper, one that would stick at nothing to get money, and that there was no depending on anything he said; and that more especially about the lieutenant's commission, she understood that there was nothing at all in it, but they told her how he had often made use of that sham to borrow money, and move gentlemen to pity him and lend him money, in hopes to get him preferment; that he had reported that he had a wife and five children in England, who he maintained out of his pay, and by these shifts had run into debt in several places, and upon several complaints for such things, he had been threatened to be turned out of the gens d'armes, and that in short he was not to be believed in anything he said, or trusted on any account.

Upon this information, Amy began to cool in her farther meddling with him, and told me it was not safe for me to attempt doing him any good, unless I resolved to put him upon suspicions and inquiries which might be to my ruin, in the condition I was now in.

I was soon confirmed in this part of his character, for the next time that Amy came to talk with him, he discovered himself more effectually; for while she had put him in hopes of procuring one to advance the money for the lieutenant's commission for him upon easy conditions, he by degrees dropped the discourse, then pretended it was too late, and that he could not get it, and then descended to ask poor Amy to lend him five hundred pistoles.

Amy pretended poverty; that her circumstances were but mean, and that she could not raise such a sum; and this she did, to try him to the utmost; he descended to three hundred, then to one hundred, then to fifty, and then to a pistole, which she lent him, and he never intending to pay it, played out of her sight as much as he could. And thus being satisfied that he was the same worthless thing he had ever been, I threw off all thoughts of him; whereas, had he been a man of any sense, and of any principle of honour, I had it in my thoughts to retire to England again, send for him over, and have lived honestly with him. But as a fool is the worst of husbands to do a woman good, so a fool is the worst husband a woman can do good to. I would willingly have done him good, but he was not qualified to receive it or make the best use of it. Had I sent him ten thousand crowns instead of eight thousand livres, and sent it with express condition that he should immediately have bought himself the commission he talked of with part of the money, and have sent some of it to relieve the necessities of his poor miserable wife at London, and to prevent his children to be kept by the parish, it was evident he would have been still but a private trooper, and his wife and children should still have starved at London, or been kept of mere charity, as, for aught he knew, they then were.

Seeing, therefore, no remedy, I was obliged to withdraw my hand from him, that had been my first destroyer, and reserve the assistance that I intended to have given him for another more desirable opportunity. All that I had now to do was to keep myself out of his sight, which was not very difficult for me to do, considering in what station he lived.

Amy and I had several consultations then upon the main question, namely, how to be sure never to chop upon him again by chance, and to be surprised into a discovery, which would have been a fatal discovery indeed. Amy proposed that we should always take care to know where the gens d'armes were quartered, and thereby effectually avoid them; and this was one way.

But this was not so as to be fully to my satisfaction; no ordinary way of inquiring where the gens d'armes were quartered was sufficient to me; but I found out a fellow who was completely qualified for the work of a spy (for France has plenty of such people). This man I employed to be a constant and particular attendant upon his person and motions; and he was especially employed and ordered to haunt him as a ghost; that he should scarce let him be ever out of his sight. He performed this to a nicety, and failed not to give me a perfect journal of all his motions from day to day, and, whether for his pleasures or his business, was always at his heels.

This was somewhat expensive, and such a fellow merited to be well paid, but he did his business so exquisitely punctual, that this poor man scarce went out of the house without my knowing the way he went, the company he kept, when he went abroad, and when he stayed at home.

By this extraordinary conduct I made myself safe, and so went out in public or stayed at home, as I found he was or was not in a possibility of being at Paris, at Versailles, or any place I had occasion to be at. This, though it was very chargeable, yet as I found it absolutely necessary, so I took no thought about the expense of it, for I knew I could not purchase my safety too dear.

By this management I found an opportunity to see what a most insignificant, unthinking life the poor indolent wretch, who, by his unactive temper, had at first been my ruin, now lived; how he only rose in the morning to go to bed at night; that saving the necessary motion of the troops, which he was obliged to attend, he was a mere motionless animal, of no consequence in the world; that he seemed to be one who, though he was indeed alive, had no manner of business in life, but to stay to be called out of it; he neither kept any company, minded any sport, played at any game, or indeed did anything of moment; but, in short, sauntered about like one that it was not two livres value, whether he was dead or alive; that when he was gone, would leave no remembrance behind him that ever he was here; that if ever he did anything in the world to be talked of, it was only to get five beggars and starve his wife. The journal of his life, which I had constantly sent me every week, was the least significant of anything of its kind that was ever seen; as it had really nothing of earnest in it, so it would make no jest to relate it. It was not important enough so much as to make the reader merry withal, and for that reason I omit it.

Yet this nothing-doing wretch was I obliged to watch and guard against, as against the only thing that was capable of doing me hurt in the world. I was to shun him as we would shun a spectre, or even the devil, if he was actually in our way; and it cost me after the rate of a hundred and fifty livres a month, and very cheap too, to have this creature constantly kept in view; that is to say, my spy undertook never to let him be out of his sight an hour, but so as that he could give an account of him, which was much the easier for to be done, considering his way of living; for he was sure that, for whole weeks together, he would be ten hours of the day half asleep on a bench at the tavern door where he quartered, or drunk within the house. Though this wicked life he led sometimes moved me to pity him, and to wonder how so well-bred, gentlemanly a man as he once was could degenerate into such a useless thing as he now appeared, yet at the same time it gave me most contemptible thoughts of him, and made me often say I was a warning for all the ladies of Europe against marrying of fools: a man of sense falls in the world, and gets up again, and a woman has some chance for herself; but with a fool, once fall, and ever undone; once in the ditch and die in the ditch; once poor, and sure to starve.

But it is time to have done with him; once I had nothing to hope for but to see him again, now my only felicity was, if possible, never to see him, and, above all, to keep him from seeing me, which, as above, I took effectual care of.

I was now returned to Paris; my little son of honour, as I called him, was left at ——, where my last country-seat then was, and I came to Paris at the prince's request; thither he came to me as soon as I arrived, and told me he came to give me joy of my return, and to make his acknowledgments for that I had given him a son. I thought, indeed, he had been going to give me a present, and so he did the next day, but in what he said then he only jested with me. He gave me his company all the evening, supped with me about midnight, and did me the honour, as I then called it, to lodge me in his arms all the night, telling me, in jest, that the best thanks for a son born was giving the pledge for another.

But as I hinted, so it was; the next morning he laid me down on my toilet a purse with three hundred pistoles. I saw him lay it down, and understood what he meant, but I took no notice of it till I came to it, as it were, casually; then I gave a great cry out, and fell a scolding in my way, for he gave me all possible freedom of speech on such occasions. I told him he was unkind, that he would never give me an opportunity to ask him for anything; and that he forced me to blush by being too much obliged, and the like; all which I knew was very agreeable to him, for as he was bountiful beyond measure, so he was infinitely obliged by my being so backward to ask any favours; and I was even with him, for I never asked him for a farthing in my life.

Upon this rallying him, he told me I had either perfectly studied the art of humour, or else, what was the greatest difficulty to others was natural to me, adding, that nothing could be more obliging to a man of honour than not to be soliciting and craving.

I told him nothing could be craving upon him; that he left no room for it; that I hoped he did not give merely to avoid the trouble of being importuned; I told him, he might depend upon it that I should be reduced very low indeed before I offered to disturb him that way.

He said, a man of honour ought always to know what he ought to do; and as he did nothing but what he knew was reasonable, he gave me leave to be free with him, if I wanted anything; that he had too much value for me to deny me anything, if I asked, but that it was infinitely agreeable to him to hear me say that what he did was to my satisfaction.

We strained compliments thus a great while; and as he had me in his arms most part of the time, so upon all my expressions of his bounty to me he put a stop to me with his kisses, and would admit me to go on no farther.

I should in this place mention, that this prince was not a subject of France, though at that time he resided at Paris, and was much at court, where I suppose he had or expected some considerable employment. But I mention it on this account; that a few days after this, he came to me, and told me he was come to bring me not the most welcome news that ever I heard from him in his life. I looked at him a little surprised, but he returned, Do not be uneasy; it is as unpleasant to me as to you, but I come to consult with you about it, and see if it cannot be made a little easy to us both.

I seemed still more concerned and surprised; at last he said it was that he believed he should be obliged to go into Italy, which, though otherwise it was very agreeable to him, yet his parting with me made it a very dull thing but to think of.

I sat mute, as one thunderstruck, for a good while; and it presently occurred to me, that I was going to lose him, which, indeed, I could but ill bear the thoughts of; and, as he told me, I turned pale. What's the matter? said he, hastily; I have surprised you indeed; and stepping to the sideboard, fills a dram of cordial water, which was of his own bringing, and comes to me. Be not surprised, said he; I'll go nowhere without you, adding several other things so kind as nothing could exceed it.

I might indeed turn pale, for I was very much surprised at first, believing that this was, as it often happens in such cases, only a project to drop me, and break off an amour which he had now carried on so long; and a thousand thoughts whirled about my head in the few moments while I was kept in suspense, for they were but a few. I say I was indeed surprised, and might, perhaps, look pale, but I was not in any danger of fainting, that I knew of.

However, it not a little pleased me to see him so concerned and anxious about me; but I stopped a little when he put the cordial to my mouth, and taking the glass in my hand, I said, My lord, your words are infinitely more of a cordial to me than this citron; for as nothing can be a greater affliction than to lose you, so nothing can be a greater satisfaction than the assurance that I shall not have that misfortune.

He made me sit down, and sat down by me, and after saying a thousand kind things to me, he turns upon me with a smile; Why, will you venture yourself to Italy with me? says he. I stopped awhile, and then answered that I wondered he would ask me that question, for I would go anywhere in the world, or all over the world, wherever he should desire me, and give me the felicity of his company.

Then he entered into a long account of the occasion of his journey, and how the king had engaged him to go, and some other circumstances which are not proper to enter into here; it being by no means proper to say anything that might lead the reader into the least guess at the person.

But to cut short this part of the story, and the history of our journey and stay abroad, which would almost fill up a volume of itself, I say, we spent all that evening in cheerful consultations about the manner of our travelling, the equipage and figure he should go in, and in what manner I should go. Several ways were proposed, but none seemed feasible, till at last I told him I thought it would be so troublesome, so expensive, and so public, that it would be many ways inconvenient to him; and though it was a kind of death to me to lose him, yet that rather than so very much perplex his affairs, I would submit to anything.

At the next visit I filled his head with the same difficulties, and then at last came over him with a proposal that I would stay in Paris, or where else he should direct; and when I heard of his safe arrival, would come away by myself, and place myself as near him as I could.

This gave him no satisfaction at all, nor would he hear any more of it; but if I durst venture myself, as he called it, such a journey, he would not lose the satisfaction of my company; and, as for the expense, that was not to be named, neither, indeed, was there room to name it, for I found that he travelled at the king's expense, as well for himself as for all his equipage, being upon a piece of secret service of the last importance.

But after several debates between ourselves, he came to this resolution, viz., that he would travel incognito, and so he should avoid all public notice, either of himself or of who went with him; and that then he should not only carry me with him, but have a perfect leisure of enjoying my agreeable company (as he was pleased to call it) all the way.

This was so obliging that nothing could be more so; upon this foot, he immediately set to work to prepare things for his journey; and, by his directions, so did I too; but now I had a terrible difficulty upon me, and which way to get over it I knew not; and that was, in what manner to take care of what I had to leave behind me. I was rich, as I have said, very rich, and what to do with it I knew not, nor who to leave in trust I knew not. I had nobody but Amy in the world, and to travel without Amy was very uncomfortable, or to leave all I had in the world with her, and, if she miscarried, be ruined at once, was still a frightful thought; for Amy might die, and whose hands things might fall into I knew not. This gave me great uneasiness, and I knew not what to do; for I could not mention it to the prince, lest he should see that I was richer than he thought I was.

But the prince made all this easy to me; for in concerting measures for our journey, he started the thing himself, and asked me merrily one evening, who I would trust with all my wealth in my absence.

My wealth, my lord, said I, except what I owe to your goodness, is but small, but yet that little I have, I confess, causes some thoughtfulness, because I have no acquaintance in Paris, that I dare trust with it, nor anybody but my woman to leave in the house; and how to do without her upon the road I do not well know.

As to the road, be not concerned, says the prince, I'll provide you servants to your mind; and as for your woman, if you can trust her, leave her here, and I'll put you in a way how to secure things as well as if you were at home. I bowed, and told him I could not be put into better hands than his own, and that therefore I would govern all my measures by his directions; so we talked no more of it that night.

The next day he sent me in a great iron chest, so large that it was as much as six lusty fellows could get up the steps into the house; and in this I put, indeed, all my wealth; and for my safety he ordered a good honest ancient man and his wife to be in the house with her, to keep her company, and a maid-servant and boy; so that there was a good family, and Amy was madam, the mistress of the house.

Things being thus secured, we set out incog., as he called it; but we had two coaches and six horses, two chaises, and about eight men-servants on horse-back, all very well armed.

Never was woman better used in this world that went upon no other account than I did. I had three women-servants to wait on me, one whereof was an old madam ———, who thoroughly understood her business, and managed everything as if she had been major domo; so I had no trouble. They had one coach to themselves, and the prince and I in the other; only that sometimes, where he knew it necessary, I went into their coach, and one particular gentleman of the retinue rode with him.

I shall say no more of the journey than that when we came to those frightful mountains, the Alps, there was no travelling in our coaches, so he ordered a horse-litter, but carried by mules, to be provided for me, and himself went on horseback; the coaches went some other way back to Lyons: then we had coaches hired at Turin, which met us at Suza; so that we were accommodated again, and went by easy journeys afterwards to Rome, where his business, whatever it was, called him to stay some time, and from thence to Venice.

He was as good as his word indeed; for I had the pleasure of his company, and, in a word, engrossed his conversation almost all the way. He took delight in showing me everything that was to be seen, and particularly in telling me something of the history of everything he showed me.

What valuable pains were here thrown away upon one who he was sure, at last, to abandon with regret! How below himself did a man of quality and of a thousand accomplishments behave in all this! it is one of my reasons for entering into this part, which otherwise would not be worth relating. Had I been a daughter or a wife, of whom it might be said that he had a just concern in their instruction or improvement, it had been an admirable step; but all this to a whore; to one who he carried with him upon no account that could be rationally agreeable, and none but to gratify the meanest of human frailties; this was the wonder of it. But such is the power of a vicious inclination. Whoring was, in a word, his darling crime, the worst excursion he made, for he was otherwise one of the most excellent persons in the world. No passions, no furious excursions, no ostentatious pride; the most humble, courteous, affable person in the world. Not an oath, not an indecent word, or the least blemish in behaviour, was to be seen in all his conversation, except as before excepted; and it has given me occasion for many dark reflections since, to look back and think that I should be the snare of such a person's life; that I should influence him to so much wickedness, and that I should be the instrument in the hand of the devil to do him so much prejudice.

We were near two years upon this grand tour, as it may be called, during most of which I resided at Rome or at Venice, having only been twice at Florence and once at Naples. I made some very diverting and useful observations in all these places, and particularly of the conduct of the ladies; for I had opportunity to converse very much among them, by the help of the old witch that travelled with us: she had been at Naples and at Venice, and had lived in the former several years, where, as I found, she had lived but a loose life, as indeed the women of Naples generally do; and, in short, I found she was fully acquainted with all the intriguing arts of that part of the world.

Here my lord bought me a little female Turkish slave, who, being taken at sea by a Maltese man-of-war, was brought in there, and of her I learnt the Turkish language, their way of dressing and dancing, and some Turkish, or rather Moorish, songs, of which I made use to my advantage, on an extraordinary occasion some years after, as you shall hear in its place. I need not say, I learnt Italian too, for I got pretty well mistress of that before I had been there a year; and as I had leisure enough, and loved the language, I read all the Italian books I could come at.

I began to be so in love with Italy, especially with Naples and Venice, that I could have been very well satisfied to have sent for Amy, and have taken up my residence there for life.

As to Rome, I did not like it at all. The swarms of ecclesiastics of all kinds on one side, and the scoundrel rabbles of the common people on the other, make Rome the unpleasantest place in the world to live in; the innumerable number of valets, lackeys, and other servants is such, that they used to say that there are very few of the common people in Rome but what have been footmen or porters, or grooms to cardinals or foreign ambassadors. In a word, they have an air of sharpening and cozening, quarrelling, and scolding, upon their general behaviour; and when I was there, the footmen made such a broil between two great families in Rome, about which of their coaches (the ladies being in the coaches on either side) should give way to the other, that there was about thirty people wounded on both sides, five or six killed outright, and both the ladies frightened almost to death.

But I have no mind to write the history of my travels on this side of the world, at least not now; it would be too full of variety.

I must not, however, omit that the prince continued in all this journey the most kind, obliging person to me in the world, and so constant, that though we were in a country where it is well known all manner of liberties are taken, I am yet well assured he neither took the liberty he knew he might have, or so much as desired it.

I have often thought of this noble person on that account; had he been but half so true, so faithful and constant, to the best lady in the world, I mean his princess, how glorious a virtue had it been in him! and how free had he been from those just reflections which touched him in her behalf when it was too late!

We had some very agreeable conversations upon this subject, and once he told me, with a kind of more than ordinary concern upon his thoughts, that he was greatly beholden to me for taking this hazardous and difficult journey, for that I had kept him honest. I looked up in his face, and coloured as red as fire: Well, well, says he, do not let that surprise you; I do say you have kept me honest. My lord, said I, 'tis not for me to explain your words, but I wish I could turn them my own way; I hope, says I, and believe we are both as honest as we can be in our circumstances. Ay, ay, says he, and honestest than I doubt I should have been if you had not been with me. I cannot say but if you had not been here I should have wandered among the gay world here, in Naples, and in Venice too, for 'tis not such a crime here as 'tis in other places; but I protest, says he, I have not touched a woman in Italy but yourself; and more than that, I have not so much as had any desire to it; so that, I say, you have kept me honest.

I was silent, and was glad that he interrupted me, or kept me from speaking, with kissing me, for really I knew not what to say. I was once going to say, that if his lady, the princess had been with him, she would doubtless have had the same influence upon his virtue, with infinitely more advantage to him; but I considered this might give him offence, and besides, such things might have been dangerous to the circumstance I stood in, so it passed off. But I must confess I saw that he was quite another man as to women, than I understood he had always been before; and it was a particular satisfaction to me, that I was thereby convinced that what he said was true, and that he was, as I may say, all my own.

I was with child again in this journey, and lay in at Venice, but was not so happy as before. I brought him another son, and a very fine boy it was, but it lived not above two months; nor, after the first touches of affection (which are usual, I believe, to all mothers) were over, was I sorry the child did not live, the necessary difficulties attending it in our travelling being considered.

After these several perambulations, my lord told me his business began to close, and we would think of returning to France, which I was very glad of, but principally on account of my treasure I had there, which, as you have heard, was very considerable. It is true, I had letters very frequently from my maid Amy, with accounts that everything was very safe, and that was very much to my satisfaction. However, as the prince's negotiations were at an end, and he was obliged to return, I was very glad to go; so we returned from Venice to Turin, and in the way I saw the famous city of Milan. From Turin we went over the mountains again, as before, and our coaches met us at Pont a Voisin, between Chamberry and Lyons; and so, by easy journeys, we arrived safely at Paris, having been absent two years, wanting about eleven days, as above.

I found the little family we left just as we left them, and Amy cried for joy when she saw me, and I almost did the same.

The prince took his leave of me the night before, for, as he told me, he knew he should be met upon the road by several persons of quality, and perhaps by the princess herself; so we lay at two different inns that night, lest some should come quite to the place, as indeed it happened.

After this I saw him not for above twenty days, being taken up in his family, and also with business; but he sent me his gentleman to tell me the reason of it, and bid me not be uneasy, and that satisfied me effectually.

In all this affluence of my good fortune, I did not forget that I had been rich and poor once already, alternately, and that I ought to know that the circumstances I was now in were not to be expected to last always; that I had one child, and expected another; and if I had bred often, it would something impair me in the great article that supported my interest, I mean, what he called beauty; that as that declined, I might expect the fire would abate, and the warmth with which I was now so caressed, would cool, and in time, like the other mistresses of great men, I might be dropt again; and that therefore it was my business to take care that I should fall as softly as I could.

I say I did not forget, therefore, to make as good provision for myself as if I had had nothing to have subsisted on but what I now gained; whereas I had not less than ten thousand pounds, as I said above, which I had amassed, or secured rather, out of the ruins of my faithful friend the jeweller, and which he, little thinking of what was so near him when he went out, told me, though in a kind of a jest, was all my own, if he was knocked on the head, and which, upon that title, I took care to preserve.

My greatest difficulty now was how to secure my wealth, and to keep what I had got; for I had greatly added to this wealth by the generous bounty of the Prince —, and the more by the private retired manner of living, which he rather desired for privacy than parsimony; for he supplied me for a more magnificent way of life than I desired, if it had been proper.

I shall cut short the history of this prosperous wickedness with telling you I brought him a third son, within little more than eleven months after our return from Italy; that now I lived a little more openly, and went by a particular name which he gave me abroad, but which I must omit, viz., the Countess de —; and had coaches and servants, suitable to the quality he had given me the appearance of; and which is more than usually happens in such cases, this held eight years from the beginning, during which time, as I had been very faithful to him, so I must say, as above, that I believe he was so separated to me, that whereas he usually had two or three women, which he kept privately, he had not in all that time meddled with any of them, but that I had so perfectly engrossed him that he dropped them all; not, perhaps, that he saved much by it, for I was a very chargeable mistress to him, that I must acknowledge, but it was all owing to his particular affection to me, not to my extravagance, for, as I said, he never gave me leave to ask him for anything, but poured in his favours and presents faster than I expected, and so fast as I could not have the assurance to make the least mention of desiring more. Nor do I speak this of my own guess, I mean about his constancy to me, and his quitting all other women; but the old harridan, as I may call her, whom he made the guide of our travelling, and who was a strange old creature, told me a thousand stories of his gallantry, as she called it, and how, as he had no less than three mistresses at one time, and as I found, all of her procuring, he had of a sudden dropped them all, and that he was entirely lost to both her and them; that they did believe he had fallen into some new hands, but she could never hear who, or where, till he sent for her to go this journey; and then the old hag complimented me upon his choice; that she did not wonder I had so engrossed him; so much beauty, &c., and there she stopped.

Upon the whole, I found by her what was, you may be sure, to my particular satisfaction, viz., that, as above, I had him all my own. But the highest tide has its ebb; and in all things of this kind, there is a reflux which sometimes also is more impetuously violent than the first aggression. My prince was a man of a vast fortune, though no sovereign, and therefore there was no probability that the expense of keeping a mistress could be injurious to him, as to his estate. He had also several employments, both out of France as well as in it; for, as above, I say he was not a subject of France, though he lived in that court. He had a princess, a wife with whom he had lived several years, and a woman (so the voice of fame reported) the most valuable of her sex, of birth equal to him, if not superior, and of fortune proportionable; but in beauty, wit, and a thousand good qualities, superior, not to most women, but even to all her sex; and as to her virtue, the character which was most justly her due, was that of, not only the best of princesses, but even the best of women.

They lived in the utmost harmony, as with such a princess it was impossible to be otherwise; but yet the princess was not insensible that her lord had his foibles, that he did make some excursions, and particularly that he had one favourite mistress, which sometimes engrossed him more than she (the princess) could wish, or be easily satisfied with. However, she was so good, so generous, so truly kind a wife, that she never gave him any uneasiness on this account; except so much as must arise from his sense of her bearing the affront of it with such patience, and such a profound respect for him as was in itself enough to have reformed him, and did sometimes shock his generous mind, so as to keep him at home, as I may call it, a great while together. And it was not long before I not only perceived it by his absence, but really got a knowledge of the reason of it, and once or twice he even acknowledged it to me.

It was a point that lay not in me to manage. I made a kind of motion once or twice to him, to leave me, and keep himself to her, as he ought by the laws and rites of matrimony to do, and argued the generosity of the princess to him, to persuade him; but I was a hypocrite; for had I prevailed with him really to be honest, I had lost him, which I could not bear the thoughts of; and he might easily see I was not in earnest. One time in particular, when I took upon me to talk at this rate, I found, when I argued so much for the virtue and honour, the birth, and above all the generous usage he found in the person of the princess with respect to his private amours, and how it should prevail upon him, &c., I found it began to affect him, and he returned, And do you indeed, says he, persuade me to leave you? Would you have me think you sincere? I looked up in his face, smiling, Not for any other favourite, my lord, says I; that would break my heart; but for madam the princess! said I; and then I could say no more; tears followed, and I sat silent awhile. Well, said he, if ever I do leave you, it shall be on the virtuous account, it shall be for the princess; I assure you it shall be for no other woman. That's enough, my lord, said I ; there I ought to submit ; and while I am assured it shall be for no other mistress, I promise your highness I will not repine ; or that, if I do, it shall be a silent grief ; it shall not interrupt your felicity.

All this while I said I knew not what, and said what I was no more able to do than he was able to leave me ; which, at that time, he owned he could not do : no, not for the princess herself.

But another turn of affairs determined this matter ; for the princess was taken very ill, and, in the opinion of all her physicians, very dangerously so. In her sickness she desired to speak with her lord, and to take her leave of him. At this grievous parting she said so many passionate, kind things to him, lamented that she had left him no children (she had had three, but they were dead) ; hinted to him that it was one of the chief things which gave her satisfaction in death, as to this world, that she should leave him room to have heirs to his family, by some princess that should supply her place ; with all humility, but with a Christian earnestness, recommended to him to do justice to such princess, whoever it should be, from whom, to be sure, he would expect justice ; that is to say, to keep to her singly, according to the solemnest part of the marriage covenant ; humbly asked his highness's pardon, if she had any way offended him ; and appealing to heaven, before whose tribunal she was to appear, that she had never violated her honour or her duty to him ; and praying to Jesus and the blessed Virgin for his highness. And thus, with the most moving and most passionate expressions of her affection to him, took her last leave of him, and died the next day.

This discourse, from a princess so valuable in herself, and so dear to him, and the loss of her following so immediately after, made such deep impressions on him, that he looked back with detestation upon the former part of his life, grew melancholy and reserved, changed his society, and much of the general conduct of his life, resolved on a life regulated most strictly by the rules of virtue and piety ; and, in a word, was quite another man.

The first part of his reformation was a storm upon me ; for about ten days after the princess's funeral he sent a message to me by his gentleman, intimating, though in very civil terms, and with a short preamble or introduction, that he desired I would not take it ill that he was obliged to let me know that he could see me no more. His gentleman told me a long story of the new regulation of life his lord had taken up ; and that he had been so afflicted for the loss of his princess, that he thought it would either shorten his life, or he would retire into some religious house, to end his days in solitude.

I need not direct anybody to suppose how I received this news. I was indeed exceedingly surprised at it, and had much ado to support myself when the first part of it was delivered, though the gentleman delivered his errand with great respect, and with all the regard to me that he was able, and with a great deal of ceremony, also telling me how much he was concerned to bring me such a message.

But when I heard the particulars of the story at large, and especially that of the lady's discourse to the prince, a little before her death, I was fully satisfied ; I knew very well he done nothing but what any man must do that had a true sense upon him of the justice of the princess's discourse to him, and of the necessity there was of his altering his course of life, if he intended to be either a Christian or an honest man. I say, when I heard this I was perfectly easy ; I confess it was a circumstance that it might be reasonably expected should have wrought something also upon me ; I that had so much to reflect upon more than the prince ; that had now no more temptation of poverty, or of the powerful motive which Amy used with me, namely, comply and live, deny and starve ; I say, I that had no poverty to introduce vice, but was grown not only well supplied, but rich ; and not only rich, but was very rich ; in a word, richer than I knew how to think of, for the truth of it was, that thinking of it sometimes almost distracted me, for want of knowing how to dispose of it, and for fear of losing it all again by some cheat or trick, not knowing anybody that I could commit the trust of it to.

Besides, I should add, at the close of this affair, that the prince did not, as I may say, turn me off rudely and with disgust, but with all the decency and goodness peculiar to himself, and that could consist with a man reformed and struck with the sense of his having abused so good a lady as his late princess had been ; nor did he send me away empty, but did everything like himself ; and, in particular, ordered his gentleman to pay the rent of the house and all the expense of his two sons, and to tell me how they were taken care of, and where, and also that I might at all times inspect the usage they had, and if I disliked anything it should be rectified; and having thus finished everything, he retired into Lorraine, or somewhere that way, where he had an estate; and I never heard of him more, I mean not as a mistress.

Now I was at liberty to go to any part of the world, and take care of my money myself. The first thing that I resolved to do, was to go directly to England, for there, I thought, being among my country-folks (for I esteemed myself an Englishwoman, though I was born in France), but there, I say, I thought I could better manage things than in France; at least, that I would be in less danger of being circumvented and deceived; but how to get away with such a treasure as I had with me was a difficult point, and what I was greatly at a loss about.

There was a Dutch merchant in Paris, that was a person of great reputation for a man of substance and of honesty, but I had no manner of acquaintance with him, nor did I know how to get acquainted with him, so as to discover my circumstances to him; but at last I employed my maid Amy (such I must be allowed to call her, notwithstanding what has been said of her, because she was in the place of a maid-servant), I say I employed my maid Amy to go to him, and she got a recommendation to him from somebody else, I knew not who, so that she got access to him well enough.

But now was my case as bad as before, for when I came to him what could I do? I had money and jewels, to a vast value, and I might leave all those with him; that I might, indeed, do; and so I might with several other merchants in Paris, who would give me bills for it, payable at London; but then I ran a hazard of my money; and I had nobody at London to send the bills to, and so to stay till I had an account that they were accepted; for I had not one friend in London that I could have recourse to, so that indeed I knew not what to do.

In this case I had no remedy but that I must trust somebody; so I sent Amy to this Dutch merchant, as I said above. He was a little surprised when Amy came to him, and talked to him of remitting a sum of about twelve thousand pistoles to England, and began to think she came to put some cheat upon him ; but when he found that Amy was but a servant, and that I came to him myself, the case was altered presently.

When I came to him myself, I presently saw such a plainness in his dealing, and such honesty in his countenance, that I made no scruple to tell him my whole story ; viz., that I was a widow, that I had some jewels to dispose of, and also some money which I had a mind to send to England, and to follow there myself ; but being but a woman, and having no correspondence in London, or anywhere else, I knew not what to do, or how to secure my effects.

He dealt very candidly with me, but advised me, when he knew my case so particularly, to take bills upon Amsterdam, and to go that way to England ; for that I might lodge my treasure in the bank there, in the most secure manner in the world, and that there he could recommend me to a man who perfectly understood jewels, and would deal faithfully with me in the disposing them.

I thanked him, but scrupled very much the travelling so far in a strange country, and especially with such a treasure about me ; that whether known or concealed I did not know how to venture with it. Then he told me he would try to dispose of them there, that is, at Paris, and convert them into money, and so get me bills for the whole ; and in a few days he brought a Jew to me, who pretended to buy the jewels. As soon as the Jew saw the jewels, I saw my folly, and it was ten thousand to one but I had been ruined, and perhaps put to death in as cruel a manner as possible ; and I was put in such a fright by it, that I was once upon the point of flying for my life, and leaving the jewels and money too in the hands of the Dutchman, without any bills or anything else. The case was thus :

As soon as the Jew saw the jewels, he falls a jabbering, in Dutch or Portuguese, to the merchant ; and I could presently perceive that they were in some great surprise, both of them ; the Jew held up his hands, looked at me with some horror, then talked Dutch again, and put himself into a thousand shapes, twisting his body, and wringing up his face this way and that way in his discourse ; stamping with his feet, and throwing abroad his hands, as if he was not in a rage only, but in a mere fury. Then he would turn and give a look at me like the devil. I thought I never saw anything so frightful in my life.

At length I put in a word. Sir, says I, to the Dutch merchant, what is all this discourse to my business? What is this gentleman in all these passions about? I wish, if he is to treat with me, he would speak that I may understand him; or if you have business of your own between you that is to be done first, let me withdraw, and I'll come again when you are at leisure.

No, no, madam, says the Dutchman, very kindly, you must not go; all our discourse is about you and your jewels, and you shall hear it presently; it concerns you very much, I assure you. Concern me, says I, what can it concern me so much as to put this gentleman into such agonies, and what makes him give me such devil's looks as he does? Why, he looks as if he would devour me.

The Jew understood me presently, continuing in a kind of rage, and spoke in French, Yes, madam, it does concern you much, very much, very much, repeating the words, shaking his head; and then turning to the Dutchman, Sir, says he, pray tell her what is the case? No, says the merchant, not yet, let us talk a little farther of it by ourselves; upon which they withdrew into another room, where still they talked very high, but in a language I did not understand. I began to be a little surprised at what the Jew had said, you may be sure, and eager to know what he meant, and was very impatient till the Dutch merchant came back, and that so impatient, that I called one of his servants to let him know I desired to speak with him. When he came in, I asked his pardon for being so impatient, but told him I could not be easy till he had told me what the meaning of all this was. Why, madam, says the Dutch merchant, in short, the meaning is what I am surprised at too. This man is a Jew, and understands jewels perfectly well, and that was the reason I sent for him, to dispose of them to him for you; but as soon as he saw them, he knew the jewels very distinctly, and flying out in a passion, as you see he did, told me, in short, that they were the very parcel of jewels which the English jeweller had about him, who was robbed going to Versailles, about eight years ago, to show them the Prince de —, and that it was for these very jewels that the poor gentleman was murdered; and he is in all this agony to make me ask you how you came by them; and he says you ought to be charged with the robbery and murder, and put to the question to discover who were the persons that did it, that they might be brought to justice. While he said this, the Jew came impudently back into the room without calling, which a little surprised me again.

The Dutch merchant spoke pretty good English, and he knew that the Jew did not understand English at all, so he told me the latter part when the Jew came into the room, in English, at which I smiled, which put the Jew into his mad fit again, and, shaking his head and making his devil's faces again, he seemed to threaten me for laughing, saying, in French, this was an affair I should have little reason to laugh at, and the like. At this I laughed again, and flouted him, letting him see that I scorned him; and, turning to the Dutch merchant, sir, says I, that those jewels were belonging to Mr. —, the English jeweller (naming his name readily); in that, says I, this person is right; but that I should be questioned how I came to have them, is a token of his ignorance, which, however, he might have managed with a little more good manners, till I had told him who I am; and both he and you too will be more easy in that part, when I should tell you that I am the unhappy widow of that Mr. —, who was so barbarously murdered going to Versailles; and that he was not robbed of those jewels, but of others; Mr. — having left those behind him with me lest he should be robbed. Had I, sir, come otherwise by them, I should not have been weak enough to have exposed them to sale here, where the thing was done, but have carried them farther off.

This was an agreeable surprise to the Dutch merchant, who, being an honest man himself, believed everything I said, which, indeed, being all really and literally true, except the deficiency of my marriage, I spoke with such an unconcerned easiness, that it might plainly be seen that I had no guilt upon me, as the Jew suggested.

The Jew was confounded when he heard that I was the jeweller's wife; but as I had raised his passion with saying he looked at me with the devil's face, he studied mischief in his heart, and answered, that should not serve my turn; so called the Dutchman out again, when he told him that he resolved to prosecute this matter farther.

There was one kind chance in this affair, which, indeed, was my deliverance, and that was, that the fool could not restrain his passion, but must let it fly to the Dutch merchant, to whom, when they withdrew a second time, as above, he told that he would bring a process against me for the murder, and that it should cost me dear for using him at that rate; and away he went, desiring the Dutch merchant to tell him when I would be there again. Had he suspected that the Dutchman would have communicated the particulars to me, he would never have been so foolish as to have mentioned that part to him.

But the malice of his thoughts anticipated him, and the Dutch merchant was so good as to give me an account of his design, which, indeed, was wicked enough in its nature; but to me it would have been worse than otherwise it would to another; for, upon examination, I could not have proved myself to be the wife of the jeweller, so the suspicion might have been carried on with the better face; and then I should also have brought all his relations in England upon me, who, finding by the proceedings, that I was not his wife, but a mistress, or, in English, a whore, would immediately have laid claim to the jewels, as I had owned them to be his.

This thought immediately rushed into my head as soon as the Dutch merchant had told me what wicked things were in the head of that cursed Jew; and the villain (for so I must call him) convinced the Dutch merchant that he was in earnest, by an expression which showed the rest of his design, and that was, a plot to get the rest of the jewels into his hand.

When first he hinted to the Dutchman that the jewels were such a man's (meaning my husband's), he made wonderful exclamations on account of their having been concealed so long; where must they have lain; and what was the woman that brought them? and that she (meaning me) ought to be immediately apprehended, and put into the hands of justice; and this was the time that, as I said, he made such horrid gestures, and looked at me so like a devil.

The merchant hearing him talk at that rate, and seeing him in earnest, said to him, Hold your tongue a little, this is a thing of consequence; if it be so, let you and I go into the next room and consider of it there; and so they withdrew, and left me.

Here, as before, I was uneasy, and called him out, and, having heard how it was, gave him that answer, that I was his wife, or widow, which the malicious Jew said should not serve my turn; and then it was that the Dutchman called him out again; and in this time of his withdrawing the merchant, finding, as above, that he was really in earnest, counterfeited a little to be of his mind, and entered into proposals with him for the thing itself.

In this they agreed to go to an advocate, or counsel, for directions how to proceed, and to meet again the next day, against which time the merchant was to appoint me to come again with the jewels, in order to sell them: No, says the merchant, I will go farther with her than so; I will desire her to leave the jewels with me, to show to another person, in order to get the better price for them. That's right, says the Jew, and I'll engage she shall never be mistress of them again; they shall either be seized by us, says he, in the king's name, or she shall be glad to give them up to us to prevent her being put to the torture.

The merchant said yes to everything he offered, and they agreed to meet the next morning about it, and I was to be persuaded to leave the jewels with him, and come to them the next day at four o'clock, in order to make a good bargain for them; and on these conditions they parted; but the honest Dutchman, filled with indignation at the barbarous design, came directly to me, and told me the whole story; And now, madam, says he, you are to consider immediately what you have to do.

I told him, if I was sure to have justice, I would not fear all that such a rogue could do to me; but how such things were carried on in France I knew not. I told him, the greatest difficulty would be to prove our marriage, for that it was done in England, and in a remote part of England too, and, which was worse, it would be hard to produce authentic vouchers of it, because we were married in private. But as to the death of your husband, madam, what can be said to that? said he. Nay, said I, what can they say to it? In England, added I, if they would offer such an injury to any one, they must prove the fact, or give just reason for their suspicions. That my husband was murdered, that every one knows; but that he was robbed, or of what, or how much, that none knows, no, not myself; and why was I not questioned for it then? I have lived in Paris ever since, lived publicly, and no man had yet the impudence to suggest such a thing of me.

I am fully satisfied of that, says the merchant; but as this is a rogue, who will stick at nothing, what can we say? And who knows what he may swear? Suppose he should swear that he knows your husband had those particular jewels with him the morning when he went out, and that he showed them to him, to consider their value, and what price he should ask the Prince de — for them?

Nay, by the same rule, said I, he may swear that I murdered my husband, if he finds it for his turn. That's true, said he, and if he should, I do not see what could save you; but added, I have found out his more immediate design; his design is to have you carried to the Châtelet, that the suspicion may appear just, and then to get the jewels out of your hands, if possible; then, at last, to drop the prosecution, on your consenting to quit the jewels to him; and how you will do to avoid this, is the question which I would have you consider of.

My misfortune, sir, said I, is, that I have no time to consider, and I have no person to consider with, or advise about it. I find that innocence may be oppressed by such an impudent fellow as this; he that does not value perjury, has any man's life at his mercy; but, sir, said I, is the justice such here, that while I may be in the hands of the public, and under prosecution, he may get hold of my effects, and get my jewels into his hands?

I don't know, says he, what may be done in that case; but if not he, if the court of justice should get hold of them, I do not know but you may find it as difficult to get them out of their hands again, and, at least, it may cost you half as much as they are worth; so I think it would be a much better way to prevent their coming at them at all.

But what course can I take to do that, says I, now they have got notice that I have them? If they get me into their hands, they will oblige me to produce them, or perhaps sentence me to prison till I do.

Nay, says he, as this brute says, too, put you to the question; that is, to the torture, on pretence of making you confess who were the murderers of your husband.

Confess! said I, how can I confess what I know nothing of.

If they come to have you to the rack, said he, they will make you confess you did it yourself, whether you did it or no, and then you are cast.

The very word rack frightened me to death almost, and I had no spirit left in me. Did it myself, said I, that's impossible!

No, madam, says he, 'tis far from impossible! the most innocent people in the world have been forced to confess themselves guilty of what they never heard of, much less had any hand in.

What then must I do? said I; what would you advise me to?

Why, says he, I would advise you to be gone; you intended to go away in four or five days, and you may as well go in two days; and if you can do so, I shall manage it so that he shall not suspect your being gone for several days after. Then he told me how the rogue would have me ordered to bring the jewels the next day for sale; and that then he would have me apprehended; how he had made the Jew believe he would join with him in his design, and that he (the merchant) would get the jewels into his hands. Now, says the merchant, I shall give you bills for the money you desired, immediately, and such as shall not fail of being paid; take your jewels with you, and go this very evening to St. Germain's en Lay; I'll send a man thither with you, and from thence he shall guide you to-morrow to Rouen, where there lies a ship of mine, just ready to sail for Rotterdam; you shall have your passage in that ship on my account, and I will send orders for him to sail as soon as you are on board, and a letter to my friend at Rotterdam to entertain and take care of you.

This was too kind an offer for me, as things stood, not to be accepted, and be thankful for; and as to going away, I had prepared everything for parting, so that I had little to do but to go back, take two or three boxes and bundles, and such things, and my maid Amy, and be gone.

Then the merchant told me the measures he had resolved to take to delude the Jew, while I made my escape, which were very well contrived indeed. First, said he, when he comes to-morrow I shall tell him that I proposed to you to leave the jewels with me, as we agreed, but that you said you would come and bring them in the afternoon, so that we must stay for you till four o'clock; but then, at that time, I will show a letter from you, as if just come in, wherein you shall excuse your not coming, for that some company came to visit you, and prevented you; but that you desire me to take care that the gentleman be ready to buy your jewels ; and that you will come to-morrow at the same hour, without fail.

When to-morrow is come, we shall wait at the time, but you not appearing, I shall seem most dissatisfied, and wonder what can be the reason ; and so we shall agree to go the next day to get out a process against you ; but the next day in the morning I'll send to give him notice that you have been at my house, but he not being there, have made another appointment, and that I desire to speak with him. When he comes, I'll tell him you appear perfectly blind as to your danger, and that you appeared much disappointed that he did not come, though you could not meet the night before ; and obliged me to have him here to-morrow at three o'clock. When to-morrow comes, says he, you shall send word that you are taken so ill that you cannot come out for that day, but that you will not fail the next day ; and the next day you shall neither come or send, nor let us ever hear any more of you ; for by that time you shall be in Holland, if you please.

I could not but approve all his measures, seeing they were so well contrived, and in so friendly a manner, for my benefit ; and as he seemed to be so very sincere, I resolved to put my life in his hands. Immediately I went to my lodgings, and sent away Amy with such bundles as I had prepared for my travelling. I also sent several parcels of my fine furniture to the merchant's house to be laid up for me, and bringing the key of the lodgings with me, I came back to his house. Here we finished our matters of money, and I delivered into his hands seven thousand eight hundred pistoles in bills and money, a copy of an assignment on the town-house of Paris, for four thousand pistoles, at three per cent. interest, attested, and a procuration for receiving the interest half-yearly ; but the original I kept myself.

I could have trusted all I had with him, for he was perfectly honest, and had not the least view of doing me any wrong. Indeed, after it was so apparent that he had, as it were, saved my life, or at least saved me from being exposed and ruined ; I say, after this, how could I doubt him in anything.

When I came to him, he had everything ready as I wanted, and as he had proposed. As to my money, he gave me first of all an accepted bill, payable at Rotterdam, for four thousand pistoles, and drawn from Genoa upon a merchant at Rotterdam, payable to a merchant at Paris, and endorsed by him to my merchant; this he assured me would be punctually paid, and so it was, to a day: the rest I had in other bills of exchange, drawn by himself upon other merchants in Holland. Having secured my jewels too, as well as I could, he sent me away the same evening in a friend's coach, which he had procured for me, to St. Germain's, and the next morning to Rouen. He also sent a servant of his own, on horseback, with me, who provided everything for me, and who carried his orders to the captain of the ship, which lay about three miles below Rouen, in the river, and by his directions I went immediately on board. The third day after I was on board, the ship went away, and we were out at sea the next day after that; and thus I took my leave of France, and got clear of an ugly business, which, had it gone on, might have ruined me, and sent me back as naked to England as I was a little before I left it.

And now Amy and I were at leisure to look upon the mischiefs that we had escaped; and had I had any religion, or any sense of a Supreme Power, managing, directing, and governing in both causes and events in this world, such a case as this would have given anybody room to have been very thankful to the Power who had not only put such a treasure into my hand, but given me such an escape from the ruin that threatened me; but I had none of those things about me; I had, indeed, a grateful sense upon my mind, of the generous friendship of my deliverer, the Dutch merchant, by whom I was so faithfully served, and by whom, as far as relates to second causes, I was preserved from destruction.

I say, I had a grateful sense upon my mind of his kindness and faithfulness to me, and I resolved to show him some testimony of it, as soon as I came to the end of my rambles, for I was yet but in a state of uncertainty, and sometimes that gave me a little uneasiness too; I had paper indeed, for my money, and he had showed himself very good to me, in conveying me away, as above; but I had not seen the end of things yet, for unless the bills were paid, I might still be a great loser by my Dutchman, and he might, perhaps, have contrived all that affair of the Jew to put me into a fright, and get me to run away, and that as if it were to save my life; that if the bills should be refused, I was cheated with a witness, and the like. But these were but surmises; and, indeed, were perfectly without cause, for the honest man acted as honest men always do, with an upright and disinterested principle, and with a sincerity not often to be found in the world. What gain he made by the exchange was just, and was nothing but what was his due, and was in the way of his business ; but otherwise he made no advantage of me at all.

When I passed in the ship between Dover and Calais, and saw beloved England once more under my view ; England, which I counted my native country, being the place I was bred up in, though not born there ; a strange kind of joy possessed my mind, and I had such a longing desire to be there, that I would have given the master of the ship twenty pistoles to have stood over and set me on shore in the Downs ; and when he told me he could not do it, that is, that he durst not do it, if I would have given him a hundred pistoles, I secretly wished that a storm would rise that might drive the ship over to the coast of England, whether they would or not, that I might be set on shore anywhere upon English ground.

This wicked wish had not been out of my thoughts above two or three hours, but the master steering away to the north, as was his course to do, we lost sight of land on that side, and only had the Flemish shore in view on our right hand, or, as the seamen call it, the starboard side ; and then, with the loss of the sight, the wish for landing in England abated, and I considered how foolish it was to wish myself out of the way of my business ; that if I had been on shore in England, I must go back to Holland on account of my bills, which were so considerable, and I having no correspondence there, that I could not have managed it without going myself. But we had not been out of sight of England many hours before the weather began to change, the winds whistled and made a noise, and the seamen said to one another that it would blow hard at night. It was then about two hours before sunset, and we were passed by Dunkirk, and I think they said we were in sight of Ostend ; but then the wind grew high, and the sea swelled, and all things looked terrible, especially to us that understood nothing but just what we saw before us ; in short, night came on, and very dark it was, the wind freshened, and blew harder and harder, and about two hours within night it blew a terrible storm.

I was not quite a stranger to the sea, having come from Rochelle to England when I was a child, and gone from London, by the river Thames, to France afterward, as I have said. But I began to be alarmed a little with the terrible clamour of the men over my head, for I had never been in a storm, and so had never seen the like, or heard it; and once offering to look out at the door of the steerage, as they called it, it struck me with such horror (the darkness, the fierceness of the wind, the dreadful height of the waves, and the hurry the Dutch sailors were in, whose language I did not understand one word of, neither when they cursed or when they prayed), I say, all these things together filled me with terror, and, in short, I began to be very much frightened.

When I was come back into the great cabin, there sat Amy, who was very sea-sick, and I had a little before given her a sup of cordial waters to help her stomach. When Amy saw me come back and sit down without speaking, for so I did, she looked two or three times up at me; at last she came running to me: Dear madam, says she, what is the matter? What makes you look so pale? Why, you an't well, what is the matter? I said nothing still, but held up my hands two or three times. Amy doubled her importunities; upon that I said no more but, Step to the steerage-door, and look out, as I did; so she went away immediately, and looked too, as I had bidden her, but the poor girl came back again in the greatest amazement and horror that ever I saw any poor creature in, wringing her hands and crying out, she was undone! she was undone! she should be drowned! they were all lost! Thus she ran about the cabin like a mad thing, and as perfectly out of her senses as any one in such a case could be supposed to be. I was frightened myself, but when I saw the girl in such a terrible agony, it brought me a little to myself, and I began to talk to her, and put her in a little hope. I told her there was many a ship in a storm that was not cast away, and I hoped we should not be drowned; that it was true the storm was very dreadful, but I did not see that the seamen were so much concerned as we were; and so I talked to her as well as I could, though my heart was full enough of it, as well as Amy's; and death began to stare in my face, ay, and something else too, that is to say, conscience, and my mind was very much disturbed; but I had nobody to comfort me.

But Amy, being in so much worse a condition, that is to say, so much more terrified at the storm than I was, I had something to do to comfort her. She was, as I have said, like one distracted, and went raving about the cabin, crying out she was undone! undone! she should be drowned! and the like; and at last, the ship giving a jerk, by the force, I suppose, of some violent wave, it threw poor Amy quite down, for she was weak enough before with being sea-sick, and as it threw her forward, the poor girl struck her head against the bulk-head, as the seamen call it, of the cabin, and laid her as dead as a stone upon the floor or deck; that is to say, she was so to all appearance.

I cried out for help, but it had been all one to have cried out on the top of a mountain, where nobody had been within five miles of me, for the seamen were so engaged, and made so much noise, that nobody heard me or came near me. I opened the great cabin door, and looked into the steerage to cry for help, but there, to increase my fright, was two seamen on their knees at prayers, and only one man who steered, and he made a groaning noise too, which I took to be saying his prayers, but it seems it was answering to those above, when they called to him to tell him which way to steer.

Here was no help for me, or for poor Amy, and there she lay still so, and in such a condition, that I did not know whether she was dead or alive. In this fright I went to her, and lifted her a little way up, setting her on the deck, with her back to the boards of the bulk-head; and I got a little bottle out of my pocket, and I held it to her nose, and rubbed her temples, and what else I could do, but still Amy showed no signs of life, till I felt for her pulse, but could hardly distinguish her to be alive. However, after a great while, she began to revive, and in about half an hour she came to herself, but remembered nothing at first of what had happened to her for a good while more.

When she recovered more fully, she asked me where she was? I told her she was in the ship yet, but God knows how long it might be. Why, madam, says she, is not the storm over? No, no, says I, Amy. Why, madam, says she, it was calm just now (meaning when she was in the swooning fit occasioned by her fall). Calm, Amy, says I, 'tis far from calm; it may be it will be calm by and by, when we are all drowned and gone to heaven.

Heaven, madam! says she, what makes you talk so? Heaven! I go to heaven! No, no, if I am drowned I am damned! Don't you know what a wicked creature I have been? I have been a whore to two men, and have lived a wretched abominable life of vice and wickedness for fourteen years. O madam, you know it, and God knows it, and, now I am to die; to be drowned! Oh! what will become of me! I am undone for ever! ay, madam, for ever! to all eternity! Oh! I am lost! I am lost! if I am drowned, I am lost for ever!

All these, you will easily suppose, must be so many stabs into the very soul of one in my own case. It immediately occurred to me, Poor Amy! what art thou that I am not? What hast thou been that I have not been? Nay, I am guilty of my own sin and thine too. Then it came to my remembrance that I had not only been the same with Amy, but that I had been the devil's instrument to make her wicked; that I had stripped her, and prostituted her to the very man that I had been naught with myself; that she had but followed me, I had been her wicked example; and I had led her into all; and that as we had sinned together, now we were likely to sink together.

All this repeated itself to my thoughts at that very moment, and every one of Amy's cries sounded thus in my ears; I am the wicked cause of it all! I have been thy ruin, Amy! I have brought thee to this, and now thou art to suffer for the sin I have enticed thee to! and if thou art lost for ever, what must I be? what must be my portion?

It is true, this difference was between us, that I said all these things within myself, and sighed and mourned inwardly; but Amy, as her temper was more violent, spoke aloud, and cried, and called out aloud, like one in an agony.

I had but small encouragement to give her, and indeed could say but very little, but I got her to compose herself a little, and not let any of the people of the ship understand what she meant or what she said; but even in her greatest composure she continued to express herself with the utmost dread and terror on account of the wicked life she had lived, and crying out she should be damned, and the like, which was very terrible to me, who knew what condition I was in myself.

Upon these serious considerations, I was very penitent too for my former sins, and cried out, though softly, two or three times, Lord have mercy upon me! to this I added abundance of resolutions of what a life I would live, if it should please God but to spare my life but this one time; how I would live a single and a virtuous life, and spend a great deal of what I had thus wickedly got, in acts of charity and doing good.

Under these dreadful apprehensions I looked back on the life I had led with the utmost contempt and abhorrence. I blushed, and wondered at myself how I could act thus, how I could divest myself of modesty and honour, and prostitute myself for gain; and I thought if ever it should please God to spare me this one time from death, it would not be possible that I should be the same creature again.

Amy went farther; she prayed, she resolved, she vowed to lead a new life, if God would spare her but this time. It now began to be daylight, for the storm held all night long, and it was some comfort to see the light of another day, which none of us expected; but the sea went mountains high, and the noise of the water was as frightful to us as the sight of the waves; nor was any land to be seen, nor did the seamen know whereabouts they were. At last, to our great joy, they made land, which was in England, and on the coast of Suffolk; and the ship being in the utmost distress, they ran for the shore, at all hazards, and with great difficulty got into Harwich, where they were safe, as to the danger of death; but the ship was so full of water, and so much damaged, that if they had not laid her on shore the same day, she would have sunk before night, according to the opinion of the seamen, and of the workmen on shore too, who were hired to assist them in stopping their leaks.

Amy was revived as soon as she heard they had espied land, and went out upon the deck, but she soon came in again to me: Oh, madam, says she, there's the land indeed to be seen. It looks like a ridge of clouds, and may be all a cloud for aught I know; but if it be land, 'tis a great way off, and the sea is in such a combustion, we shall all perish before we can reach it. 'Tis the dreadfulest sight to look at the waves that ever was seen. Why, they are as high as mountains; we shall certainly be all swallowed up, for all the land is so near.

I had conceived some hope, that if they saw land, we should be delivered; and I told her she did not understand things of that nature; that she might be sure if they saw land they would go directly towards it, and would make into some harbour ; but it was, as Amy said, a frightful distance to it. The land looked like clouds, and the sea went as high as mountains, so that no hope appeared in the seeing the land, but we were in fear of foundering before we could reach it. This made Amy so desponding still ; but as the wind, which blew from the east, or that way, drove us furiously towards the land, so when, about half an hour after, I stepped to the steerage door and looked out, I saw the land much nearer than Amy represented it ; so I went in and encouraged Amy again, and indeed was encouraged myself.

In about an hour, or something more, we see, to our infinite satisfaction, the open harbour of Harwich, and the vessel standing directly towards it, and in a few minutes more the ship was in smooth water, to our inexpressible comfort ; and thus I had, though against my will, and contrary to my true interest, what I wished for, to be driven away to England, though it was by a storm.

Nor did this incident do either Amy or me much service, for the danger being over, the fears of death vanished with it, ay, and our fear of what was beyond death also. Our sense of the life we had lived went off, and with our return to life, our wicked taste of life returned, and we were both the same as before, if not worse. So certain is it, that the repentance which is brought about by the mere apprehensions of death, wears off as those apprehensions wear off ; and death-bed repentance, or storm repentance, which is much the same, is seldom true.

However, I do not tell you that this was all at once neither ; the fright we had at sea lasted a little while afterwards, at least, the impression was not quite blown off as soon as the storm ; especially poor Amy, as soon as she set her foot on shore, she fell flat upon the ground and kissed it, and gave God thanks for her deliverance from the sea ; and turning to me when she got up, I hope, madam, says she, you will never go upon the sea again.

I know not what ailed me, not I ; but Amy was much more penitent at sea, and much more sensible of her deliverance when she landed and was safe, than I was. I was in a kind of stupidity, I know not well what to call it ; I had a mind full of horror in the time of the storm, and saw death before me as plainly as Amy, but my thoughts got no vent, as Amy's did. I had a silent sullen kind of grief, which could not break out either in words or tears, and which was therefore much the worse to bear.

I had a terror upon me for my wicked life past, and firmly believed I was going to the bottom, launching into death, where I was to give an account of all my past actions; and in this state, and on that account, I looked back upon my wickedness with abhorrence, as I have said above; but I had no sense of repentance from the true motive of repentance; I saw nothing of the corruption of nature, the sin of my life, as an offence against God, as a thing odious to the holiness of his being, as abusing his mercy, and despising his goodness. In short, I had no thorough effectual repentance, no sight of my sins in their proper shape, no view of a Redeemer, or hope in him. I had only such a repentance as a criminal has at the place of execution, who is sorry, not that he has committed the crime, as it is a crime, but sorry that he is to be hanged for it.

It is true Amy's repentance wore off too, as well as mine, but not so soon. However, we were both very grave for a time.

As soon as we could get a boat from the town, we went on shore, and immediately went to a public-house in the town of Harwich, where we were to consider seriously what was to be done, and whether we should go up to London, or stay till the ship was refitted, which, they said, would be a fortnight, and then go for Holland, as we intended, and as business required.

Reason directed that I should go to Holland, for there I had all my money to receive, and there I had persons of good reputation and character to apply to, having letters to them from the honest Dutch merchant at Paris, and they might perhaps give me a recommendation again to merchants in London, and so I should get acquaintance with some people of figure, which was what I loved; whereas now I knew not one creature in the whole city of London, or anywhere else, that I could go and make myself known to. Upon these considerations, I resolved to go to Holland, whatever came on it.

But Amy cried and trembled, and was ready to fall into fits when I did but mention going upon the sea again, and begged of me not to go, or if I would go, that I would leave her behind, though I was to send her a begging. The people in the inn laughed at her, and jested with her, asked her if she had any sins to confess that she was ashamed should be heard of, and that she was troubled with an evil conscience; told her, if she came to sea, and to be in a storm, if she had lain with her master, she would certainly tell her mistress of it, and that it was a common thing for poor maids to confess all the young men they had lain with; that there was one poor girl that went over with her mistress, whose husband was a . . . . . r, in . . . . . , in the city of London, who confessed, in the terror of a storm, that she had lain with her master, and all the apprentices, so often, and in such and such places; and made the poor mistress, when she returned to London, fly at her husband and make such a stir as was indeed the ruin of the whole family. Amy could bear all that well enough, for though she had indeed lain with her master, it was with her mistress's knowledge and consent, and, which was worse, was her mistress's own doing. I record it to the reproach of my own vice, and to expose the excesses of such wickedness as they deserve to be exposed.

I thought Amy's fear would have been over by that time the ship would be gotten ready, but I found the girl was rather worse and worse; and when I came to the point, that we must go on board or lose the passage, Amy was so terrified that she fell into fits; so the ship went away without us.

But my going being absolutely necessary, as above, I was obliged to go in the packet-boat some time after, and leave Amy behind at Harwich, but with directions to go to London, and stay there to receive letters and orders from me what to do. Now I was become, from a lady of pleasure, a woman of business, and of great business too, I assure you.

I got me a servant at Harwich to go over with me, who had been at Rotterdam, knew the place, and spoke the language, which was a great help to me, and away I went. I had a very quick passage and pleasant weather, and, coming to Rotterdam, soon found out the merchant to whom I was recommended, who received me with extraordinary respect. And first he acknowledged the accepted bill for 4000 pistoles, which he afterwards paid punctually; other bills that I had also payable at Amsterdam he procured to be received for me; and whereas one of the bills for a thousand two hundred crowns was protested at Amsterdam, he paid it me himself, for the honour of the indorser, as he called it, which was my friend the merchant at Paris.

There I entered into a negotiation by his means for my jewels, and he brought me several jewellers to look on them, and particularly one to value them, and to tell me what every particular was worth. This was a man who had great skill in jewels, but did not trade at that time, and he was desired by the gentlemen that I was with to see that I might not be imposed upon.

All this work took me up near half a year, and by managing my business thus myself, and having large sums to do with, I became as expert in it as any she-merchant of them all. I had credit in the bank for a large sum of money, and bills and notes for much more.

After I had been here about three months, my maid Amy writes me word that she had received a letter from her friend, as she called him; that, by the way, was the prince's gentleman, that had been Amy's extraordinary friend, indeed, for Amy owned to me he had lain with her a hundred times, that is to say, as often as he pleased, and perhaps in the eight years which that affair lasted, it might be a great deal oftener. This was what she called her friend, who she corresponded with upon this particular subject; and among other things, sent her this particular news, that my extraordinary friend, my real husband, who rode in the gens d'armes, was dead, that he was killed in a rencounter, as they call it, or accidental scuffle among the troopers; and so the jade congratulated me upon my being now a real free woman. And now, madam, says she, at the end of her letter, you have nothing to do but to come hither, and set up a coach and a good equipage, and if beauty and a good fortune won't make you a duchess, nothing will. But I had not fixed my measures yet. I had no inclination to be a wife again. I had had such bad luck with my first husband, I hated the thoughts of it. I found that a wife is treated with indifference, a mistress with a strong passion; a wife is looked upon as but an upper servant, a mistress is a sovereign; a wife must give up all she has, have every reserve she makes for herself be thought hard of, and be upbraided with her very pin-money; whereas a mistress makes the saying true, that what the man has is hers, and what she has is her own; the wife bears a thousand insults, and is forced to sit still and bear it, or part, and be undone; a mistress insulted helps herself immediately, and takes another.

These were my wicked arguments for whoring, for I never set against them the difference another way; I may say, every other way; how that, first, a wife appears boldly and honourably with her husband, lives at home, and possesses his house, his servants, his equipages, and has a right to them all, and to call them her own; entertains his friends, owns his children, and has the return of duty and affection from them, as they are here her own, and claims upon his estate, by the custom of England, if he dies and leaves her a widow.

The whore skulks about in lodgings, is visited in the dark, disowned upon all occasions before God and man; is maintained, indeed, for a time, but is certainly condemned to be abandoned at last, and left to the miseries of fate and her own just disaster. If she has any children, her endeavour is to get rid of them, and not maintain them; and if she lives, she is certain to see them all hate her, and be ashamed of her; while the vice rages, and the man is in the devil's hand, she has him; and while she has him, she makes a prey of him; but if he happens to fall sick, if any disaster befalls him, the cause of all lies upon her. He is sure to lay all his misfortunes at her door; and if once he comes to repentance, or makes but one step towards a reformation, he begins with her, leaves her, uses her as she deserves, hates her, abhors her, and sees her no more; and that with this never-failing addition, namely, that the more sincere and unfeigned his repentance is, the more earnestly he looks up, and the more effectually he looks in, the more his aversion to her increases, and he curses her from the bottom of his soul; nay, it must be from a kind of excess of charity, if he so much as wishes God may forgive her.

The opposite circumstances of a wife and whore are such and so many, and I have since seen the difference with such eyes, as I could dwell upon the subject a great while; but my business is history. I had a long scene of folly yet to run over. Perhaps the moral of all my story may bring me back again to this part, and if it does, I shall speak of it fully.

While I continued in Holland, I received several letters from my friend (so I had good reason to call him) the merchant in Paris, in which he gave me a farther account of the conduct of that rogue the Jew, and how he acted after I was gone; how impatient he was while the said merchant kept him in suspense, expecting me to come again; and how he raged when he found I came no more.

It seems, after he found I did not come, he found out, by his unwearied inquiry, where I had lived; and that I had been kept as a mistress by some great person, but he could never learn by who, except that he learnt the colour of his livery. In pursuit of this inquiry he guessed at the right person, but could not make it out, or offer any positive proof of it, but he found out the prince's gentleman, and talked so saucily to him of it, that the gentleman treated him, as the French call it, a coup de baton; that is to say, caned him very severely, as he deserved; and that not satisfying him, or curing his insolence, he was met one night late upon the Pont Neuf, in Paris, by two men, who muffling him up in a great cloak, carried him into a more private place, and cut off both his ears, telling him it was for talking impudently of his superiors; adding, that he should take care to govern his tongue better, and behave with more manners, or the next time, they would cut his tongue out of his head.

This put a check to his sauciness that way; but he comes back to the merchant, and threatened to begin a process against him for corresponding with me, and being accessory to the murder of the jeweller, &c.

The merchant found by his discourse, that he supposed I was protected by the said Prince de —, nay, the rogue said he was sure I was in his lodgings at Versailles; for he never had so much as the least intimation of the way I was really gone; but that I was there he was certain, and certain that the merchant was privy to it. The merchant bade him defiance; however, he gave him a great deal of trouble, and put him to a great charge, and had like to have brought him in for a party to my escape, in which case he would have been obliged to have produced me, and that in the penalty of some capital sum of money.

But the merchant was too many for him another way, for he brought an information against him for a cheat; wherein, laying down the whole fact, how he intended falsely to accuse the widow of the jeweller for the supposed murder of her husband; that he did it purely to get the jewels from her; and that he offered to bring him [the merchant] in, to be confederate with him, and to share the jewels between them; proving also his design to get the jewels into his hands, and then to have dropped the prosecution, upon condition of my quitting the jewels to him. Upon this charge he got him laid by the heels, so he was sent to the Conciergerie, that is to say, to Bridewell, and the merchant cleared. He got out of jail in a little while, though not without the help of money, and continued teasing the merchant a long while, and at last threatening to assassinate and murder him; so the merchant, who, having buried his wife about two months before, was now a single man, and not knowing what such a villain might do, thought fit to quit Paris, and came away to Holland also.

It is most certain, that speaking of originals, I was the source and spring of all that trouble and vexation to this honest gentleman; and as it was afterwards in my power to have made him full satisfaction, and did not, I cannot say but I added ingratitude to all the rest of my follies; but of that I shall give a fuller account presently.

I was surprised one morning, when being at the merchant's house who he had recommended me to in Rotterdam, and being busy in his counting-house, managing my bills, and preparing to write a letter to him to Paris, I heard a noise of horses at the door, which is not very common in a city where everybody passes by water; but he had, it seems, ferried over the Maze from Williamstadt, and so came to the very door, and I looking towards the door upon hearing the horses, saw a gentleman alight and come in at the gate. I knew nothing, and expected nothing to be sure, of the person; but, as I say, was surprised, and indeed more than ordinarily surprised, when coming nearer to me, I saw it was my merchant of Paris, my benefactor, and indeed my deliverer.

I confess it was an agreeable surprise to me, and I was exceeding glad to see him, who was so honourable and so kind to me, and who indeed had saved my life. As soon as he saw me he run to me, took me in his arms, and kissed me with a freedom that he never offered to take with me before; Dear Madam ———, says he, I am glad to see you safe in this country; if you had stayed two days longer in Paris you had been undone. I was so glad to see him that I could not speak a good while, and I burst out into tears without speaking a word for a minute, but I recovered that disorder, and said,

The more, sir, is my obligation to you that saved my life ; and added, I am glad to see you here, that I may consider how to balance an account in which I am so much your debtor. You and I will adjust that matter easily, says he, now we are so near together ; pray where do you lodge ? says he.

In a very honest, good house, said I, where that gentleman, your friend, recommended me ; pointing to the merchant in whose house we then were.

And where you may lodge too sir, says the gentleman, if it suits with your business, and your other conveniency.

With all my heart, says he ; then, madam, adds he, turning to me, I shall be near you, and have time to tell you a story which will be very long, and yet many ways very pleasant to you ; how troublesome that devilish fellow, the Jew, has been to me on your account, and what a hellish snare he had laid for you, if he could have found you.

I shall have leisure too, sir, said I, to tell you all my adventures since that ; which have not been a few, I assure you.

In short, he took up his lodgings in the same house where I lodged, and the room he lay in opened, as he was wishing it would, just opposite to my lodging-room, so we could almost call out of bed to one another ; and I was not at all shy of him on that score, for I believed him perfectly honest, and so indeed he was ; and if he had not, that article was at present no part of my concern.

It was not till two or three days, and after his first hurries of business were over, that we began to enter into the history of our affairs on every side, but when we began, it took up all our conversation for almost a fortnight. First, I gave him a particular account of everything that happened material upon my voyage, and how we were driven into Harwich by a very terrible storm ; how I had left my woman behind me, so frightened with the danger she had been in, that she durst not venture to set her foot into a ship again any more, and that I had not come myself, if the bills I had of him had not been payable in Holland ; but that money, he might see, would make a woman go anywhere.

He seemed to laugh at all our womanish fears upon the occasion of the storm, telling me it was nothing but what was very ordinary in those seas, but that they had harbours on every coast so near that they were seldom in danger of being lost indeed ; For, says he, if they cannot fetch one coast, they can always stand away for another, and run afore it, as he called it, for one side or other. But when I came to tell him what a crazy ship it was, and how, even when they got into Harwich, and into smooth water, they were fain to run the ship on shore, or she would have sunk in the very harbour ; and when I told him, that when I looked out at the cabin door, I saw the Dutchmen, one upon his knees here, and another there, at their prayers, then indeed, he acknowledged I had reason to be alarmed ; but smiling, he added, But you, madam, says he, are so good a lady, and so pious, you would but have gone to heaven a little the sooner : the difference had not been much to you.

I confess, when he said this, it made all the blood turn in my veins, and I thought I should have fainted. Poor gentleman, thought I, you know little of me ; what would I give to be really what you really think me to be ! He perceived the disorder, but said nothing till I spoke ; when, shaking my head, O sir, said I, death in any shape has some terror in it, but in the frightful figure of a storm at sea, and a sinking ship, it comes with a double, a treble, and indeed, an inexpressible horror ; and if I were that saint you think me to be (which God knows I am not), it is still very dismal ; I desire to die in a calm, if I can. He said a great many good things, and very prettily ordered his discourse between serious reflection and compliment, but I had too much guilt to relish it as it was meant, so I turned it off to something else, and talked of the necessity I had on me to come to Holland, but I wished myself safe on shore in England again.

He told me, he was glad I had such an obligation upon me to come over into Holland, however ; but hinted that he was so interested in my welfare, and besides had such farther designs upon me, that if I had not so happily been found in Holland, he was resolved to have gone to England to see me ; and that it was one of the principal reasons of his leaving Paris.

I told him I was extremely obliged to him for so far interesting himself in my affairs, but that I had been so far his debtor before, that I knew not how anything could increase the debt ; for I owed my life to him already, and I could not be in debt for anything more valuable than that. He answered in the most obliging manner possible, that he would put it in my power to pay that debt, and all the obligations besides that ever he had, or should be able to lay upon me.

I began to understand him now, and to see plainly that he resolved to make love to me; but I would by no means seem to take the hint, and besides I knew that he had a wife with him in Paris; and I had, just then, at least, no gust to any more intriguing; however, he surprised me into a sudden notice of the thing a little while after, by saying something in his discourse that he did, as he said, in his wife's days. I started at that word, What mean you by that, sir? said I; have you not a wife at Paris? No, madam, indeed, said he, my wife died the beginning of September last; which it seems was but a little after I came away.

We lived in the same house all this while; and as we lodged not far off of one another, opportunities were not wanting of as near an acquaintance as we might desire; nor have such opportunities the least agency in vicious minds to bring to pass even what they might not intend at first.

However, though he courted so much at a distance, yet his pretensions were very honourable; and as I had before found him a most disinterested friend, and perfectly honest in his dealings, even when I trusted him with all I had, so now I found him strictly virtuous, till I made him otherwise myself, even almost whether he would or no, as you shall hear.

It was not long after our former discourse, when he repeated what he had insinuated before, namely, that he had yet a design to lay before me, which, if I would agree to his proposals, would more than balance all accounts between us. I told him I could not reasonably deny him anything; and except one thing, which I hoped and believed he would not think of, I should think myself very ungrateful if I did not do everything for him that lay in my power.

He told me, what he should desire of me would be fully in my power to grant, or else he should be very unfriendly to offer it; and still all this while he declined making the proposal, as he called it, and so for that time we ended our discourse, turning it off to other things; so that, in short, I began to think he might have met with some disaster in his business, and might have come away from Paris in some discredit, or had had some blow on his affairs in general; and as really I had kindness enough to have parted with a good sum to have helped him, and was in gratitude bound to have done so, he having so effectually saved to me all I had; so I resolved to make him the offer the first time I had an opportunity, which two or three days after offered itself, very much to my satisfaction.

He had told me at large, though on several occasions, the treatment he had met with from the Jew, and what expense he had put him to; how at length he had cast him, as above, and had recovered good damage of him, but that the rogue was unable to make him any considerable reparation. He had told me also how the Prince d'——'s gentleman had resented his treatment of his master; and how he had caused him to be used upon the Pont Neuf, &c., as I have mentioned above, which I laughed at most heartily.

It is a pity, said I, that I should sit here and make that gentleman no amends; if you would direct me, sir, said I, how to do it, I would make him a handsome present, and acknowledge the justice he had done to me, as well as to the prince, his master. He said he would do what I directed in it; so I told him I would send him five hundred crowns. That's too much, said he, for you are but half interested in the usage of the Jew; it was on his master's account he corrected him, not on yours. Well, however, we were obliged to do nothing in it, for neither of us knew how to direct a letter to him, or to direct anybody to him; so I told him I would leave it till I came to England, for that my woman, Amy, corresponded with him, and that he had made love to her.

Well, but sir, said I, as in requital for his generous concern for me, I am careful to think of him, it is but just that what expense you have been obliged to be at, which was all on my account, should be repaid you; and therefore, said I, Let me see;—and there I paused, and began to reckon up what I had observed from his own discourse it had cost him in the several disputes and hearings which he had with that dog of a Jew, and I cast them up at something above 2,130 crowns; so I pulled out some bills which I had upon a merchant in Amsterdam, and a particular account in bank, and was looking on them in order to give them to him.

When he seeing evidently what I was going about, interrupted me with some warmth, and told me he would have nothing of me on that account, and desired I would not pull out my bills and papers on that score; that he had not told me the story on that account, or with any such view; that it had been his misfortune first to bring that ugly rogue to me, which, though it was with a good design, yet he would punish himself with the expense he had been at, for his being so unlucky to me; that I could not think so hard of him as to suppose he would take money of me, a widow, for serving me, and doing acts of kindness to me in a strange country, and in distress too; but he said he would repeat what he had said before, that he kept me for a deeper reckoning, and that, as he had told me, he would put me into a posture to even all that favour, as I called it, at once, so we should talk it over another time, and balance all together.

Now I expected it would come out, but still he put it off, as before, from whence I concluded it could not be matter of love, for that those things are not usually delayed in such a manner, and therefore it must be matter of money; upon which thought I broke the silence, and told him, that as he knew I had, by obligation, more kindness for him than to deny any favour to him that I could grant, and that he seemed backward to mention his case, I begged leave of him to give me leave to ask him whether anything lay upon his mind with respect to his business and effects in the world; that if it did, he knew what I had in the world as well as I did; and that if he wanted money, I would let him have any sum for his occasion, as far as five or six thousand pistoles, and he should pay me as his own affairs would permit; and that, if he never paid me, I would assure him that I would never give him any trouble for it.

He rose up with ceremony, and gave me thanks in terms that sufficiently told me he had been bred among people more polite and more courteous than is esteemed the ordinary usage of the Dutch; and after his compliment was over, he came nearer to me, and told me that he was obliged to assure me, though with repeated acknowledgments of my kind offer, that he was not in any want of money; that he had met with no uneasiness in any of his affairs, no, not of any kind whatever, except that of the loss of his wife and one of his children, which indeed had troubled him much; but that this was no part of what he had to offer me, and by granting which I should balance all obligations; but that, in short, it was, that, seeing Providence had (as it were for that purpose) taken his wife from him, I would make up the loss to him; and with that he held me fast in his arms, and, kissing me, would not give me leave to say no, and hardly to breathe.

At length, having got room to speak, I told him, that as I had said before, I could deny him but one thing in the world, I was very sorry he should propose that thing only that I could not grant.

I could not but smile, however, to myself, that he should make so many circles and roundabout motions to come at a discourse which had no such rarity at the bottom of it, if he had known all. But there was another reason why I resolved not to have him, when, at the same time, if he had courted me in a manner less honest or virtuous, I believe I should not have denied him; but I shall come to that part presently.

He was, as I have said, long a bringing it out, but when he had brought it out, he pursued it with such importunities as would admit of no denial, at least he intended they should not; but I resisted them obstinately, and yet with expressions of the utmost kindness and respect for him that could be imagined, often telling him there was nothing else in the world that I could deny him, and showing him all the respect, and upon all occasions treating him with intimacy and freedom, as if he had been my brother.

He tried all the ways imaginable to bring his design to pass, but I was inflexible; at last, he thought of a way, which, he flattered himself, would not fail; nor would he have been mistaken perhaps, in any other woman in the world but me; this was, to try if he could take me at an advantage and get to bed to me, and then, as was most rational to think, I should willingly enough marry him afterwards.

We were so intimate together, that nothing but man and wife could, or at least ought, to be more; but still our freedoms kept within the bounds of modesty and decency. But one evening, above all the rest, we were very merry, and I fancied he pushed the mirth to watch for his advantage; and I resolved that I would, at least, feign to be as merry as he; and that, in short, if he offered anything, he should have his will easily enough.

together, I said, Come, 'tis one o'clock, I must go to bed. Well, says he, I'll go with you. No, no, says I, go to your own chamber. He said he would go to bed with me. Nay, says I, if you will, I don't know what to say; if I can't help it, you must. However, I got from him, left him, and went into my chamber, but did not shut the door, and, as he could easily see that I was undressing myself, he steps to his own room, which was but on the same floor, and in a few minutes undresses himself also, and returns to my door in his gown and slippers.

I thought he had been gone indeed, and so that he had been in jest; and, by the way, thought either he had no mind to the thing, or that he never intended it; so I shut my door, that is, latched it, for I seldom locked or bolted it, and went to bed. I had not been in bed a minute, but he comes in his gown to the door, and opens it a little way, but not enough to come in, or look in, and says softly, What, are you really gone to bed? Yes, yes, says I, get you gone. No, indeed, says he, I shall not be gone, you gave me leave before to come to bed, and you shan't say get you gone now. So he comes into my room, and then turns about, and fastens the door, and immediately comes to the bedside to me. I pretended to scold and struggle, and bid him begone, with more warmth than before; but it was all one; he had not a rag of clothes on but his gown and slippers and shirt, so he throws off his gown, and throws open the bed, and came in at once.

I made a seeming resistance, but it was no more indeed; for, as above, I resolved from the beginning he should lie with me if he would, and for the rest I left it to come after.

Well, he lay with me that night, and the two next, and very merry we were all the three days between; but the third night he began to be a little more grave. Now, my dear, says he, though I have pushed this matter farther than ever I intended, or than I believe you expected from me, who never made any pretences to you but what were very honest; yet to heal it all up, and let you see how sincerely I meant at first, and how honest I will ever be to you, I am ready to marry you still, and desire you to let it be done to-morrow morning; and I will give you the same fair conditions of marriage as I would have done before.

This, it must be owned, was a testimony that he was very honest, and that he loved me sincerely; but I construed it quite another way, namely, that he aimed at the money. But how surprised did he look, and how was he confounded, when he found me receive his proposal with coldness and indifference, and still tell him that it was the only thing I could not grant.

He was astonished. What, not take me now! says he, when I have been a-bed with you! I answered coldly, though respectfully still, It is true, to my shame be it spoken, says I, that you have taken me by surprise, and have had your will of me; but I hope you will not take it ill that I cannot consent to marry, for all that. If I am with child, said I, care must be taken to manage that as you shall direct; I hope you won't expose me, for my having exposed myself to you, but I cannot go any farther. And at that point I stood, and would hear of no matrimony by any means.

Now because this may seem a little odd, I shall state the matter clearly; as I understood it myself. I knew that while I was a mistress, it is customary for the person kept to receive from them that keep; but if I should be a wife, all I had then was given up to the husband, and I was thenceforth to be under his authority only; and as I had money enough, and needed not fear being what they call a cast-off mistress, so I had no need to give him twenty thousand pounds to marry me, which had been buying my lodging too dear a great deal.

Thus his project of coming to bed to me was a bite upon himself, while he intended it for a bite upon me; and he was no nearer his aim of marrying me than he was before. All his arguments he could urge upon the subject of matrimony were at an end, for I positively declined marrying him; and as he had refused the thousand pistoles which I had offered him in compensation for his expenses and loss at Paris, with the Jew, and had done it upon the hopes he had of marrying me; so when he found his way difficult still, he was amazed, and I had some reason to believe, repented that he had refused the money.

But thus it is when men run into wicked measures to bring their designs about. I that was infinitely obliged to him before, began to talk to him as if I had balanced accounts with him now, and that the favour of lying with a whore was equal, not to the thousand pistoles only, but to all the debt I owed him, for saving my life and all my effects.

But he drew himself into it, and though it was a dear bargain, yet it was a bargain of his own making; he could not say I had tricked him into it; but as he projected and drew me in to lie with him, depending that was a sure game in order to a marriage, so I granted him the favour, as he called it, to balance the account of favours received from him, and keep the thousand pistoles with a good grace.

He was extremely disappointed in this article, and knew not how to manage for a great while; and as I dare say, if he had not expected to have made it an earnest for marrying me, he would never have attempted me the other way; so, I believed, if it had not been for the money, which he knew I had, he would never have desired to marry me after he had lain with me. For, where is the man that cares to marry a whore, though of his own making? And as I knew him to be no fool, so I did him no wrong, when I supposed that, but for the money, he would not have had any thoughts of me that way, especially after my yielding as I had done; in which it is to be remembered, that I made no capitulation for marrying him, when I yielded to him, but let him do just what he pleased, without any previous bargain.

Well, hitherto we went upon guesses at one another's designs; but as he continued to importune me to marry, though he had lain with me, and still did lie with me as often as he pleased, and I continued to refuse to marry him, though I let him lie with me whenever he desired it; I say, as these two circumstances made up our conversation, it could not continue long thus, but we must come to an explanation.

One morning, in the middle of our unlawful freedoms, that is to say, when we were in bed together, he sighed, and told me he desired my leave to ask me one question, and that I would give him an answer to it, with the same ingenious freedom and honesty that I had used to treat him with. I told him I would. Why then his question was, why I would not marry him, seeing I allowed him all the freedom of a husband? Or, says he, my dear, since you have been so kind as to take me to your bed, why will you not make me your own, and take me for good and all, that we may enjoy ourselves without any reproach to one another?

I told him, that as I confessed it was the only thing I could not comply with him in, so it was the only thing in all my actions that I could not give him a reason for. That it was true I had let him come to bed to me, which was supposed to be the greatest favour a woman could grant ; but it was evident, and he might see it, that as I was sensible of the obligation I was under to him for saving me from the worst circumstance it was possible for me to be brought to, I could deny him nothing ; and if I had had any greater favour to yield him, I should have done it, that of matrimony only excepted, and he could not but see that I loved him to an extraordinary degree, in every part of my behaviour to him ; but that as to marrying, which was giving up my liberty, it was what once he knew I had done, and he had seen how it had hurried me up and down in the world, and what it had exposed me to ; that I had an aversion to it, and desired he would not insist upon it. He might easily see I had no aversion to him ; and that if I was with child by him, he should see a testimony of my kindness to the father, for that I would settle all I had in the world upon the child.

He was mute a good while ; at last, says he, Come, my dear, you are the first woman in the world that ever lay with a man and then refused to marry him, and therefore there must be some other reason for your refusal ; and I have therefore one other request, and that is, if I guess at the true reason, and remove the objection, will you then yield to me ? I told him if he removed the objection I must needs comply, for I should certainly do everything that I had no objection against.

Why then, my dear, it must be that either you are already engaged or married to some other man, or you are not willing to dispose of your money to me, and expect to advance yourself higher with your fortune. Now, if it be the first of these, my mouth will be stopped, and I have no more to say ; but if it be the last, I am prepared effectually to remove the objection, and answer all you can say on that subject.

I took him up short at the first of these, telling him he must have base thoughts of me indeed, to think that I could yield to him in such a manner as I had done, and continue it with so much freedom, as he found I did, if I had a husband, or were engaged to any other man ; and that he might depend upon it that was not my case, nor any part of my case.

Why then, said he, as to the other, I have an offer to make to you that shall take off all the objection, viz., that I will not touch one pistole of your estate more than shall be with your own voluntary consent, neither now or at any other time, but you shall settle it as you please for your life, and upon who you please after your death ; that I should see he was able to maintain me without it ; and that it was not for that that he followed me from Paris.

I was indeed surprised at that part of his offer, and he might easily perceive it ; it was not only what I did not expect, but it was what I knew not what answer to make to. He had, indeed, removed my principal objection, nay, all my objections, and it was not possible for me to give any answer ; for if upon so generous an offer I should agree with him, I then did as good as confess that it was upon the account of my money that I refused him ; and that though I could give up my virtue, and expose myself, yet I would not give up my money, which, though it was true, yet was really too gross for me to acknowledge, and I could not pretend to marry him upon that principle neither. Then as to having him, and make over all my estate out of his hands, so as not to give him the management of what I had, I thought it would be not only a little Gothic and inhuman, but would be always a foundation of unkindness between us, and render us suspected one to another ; so that upon the whole I was obliged to give a new turn to it, and talk upon a kind of an elevated strain, which really was not in my thoughts at first, at all ; for I own, as above, the divesting myself of my estate, and putting my money out of my hand, was the sum of the matter that made me refuse to marry ; but, I say, I gave it a new turn upon this occasion, as follows :

I told him, I had, perhaps, different notions of matrimony from what the received custom had given us of it ; that I thought a woman was a free agent, as well as a man, and was born free, and could she manage herself suitably, might enjoy that liberty to as much purpose as the men do ; that the laws of matrimony were indeed otherwise, and mankind at this time acted quite upon other principles ; and those such that a woman gave herself entirely away from herself, in marriage, and capitulated only to be, at best, but an upper servant, and from the time she took the man, she was no better or worse than the servant among the Israelites, who had his ears bored, that is, nailed to the door-post, who by that act gave himself up to be a servant during life.

That the very nature of the marriage contract was, in short, nothing but giving up liberty, estate, authority, and everything to the man, and the woman was indeed a mere woman ever after, that is to say, a slave.

He replied, that though in some respects it was as I had said, yet I ought to consider that as an equivalent to this, the man had all the care of things devolved upon him; that the weight of business lay upon his shoulders, and as he had the trust, so he had the toil of life upon him; his was the labour, his the anxiety of living; that the woman had nothing to do but to eat the fat and drink the sweet; to sit still and look around her, be waited on and made much of, be served and loved, and made easy, especially if the husband acted as became him; and that, in general, the labour of the man was appointed to make the woman live quiet and unconcerned in the world; that they had the name of subjection without the thing; and if, in inferior families, they had the drudgery of the house, and care of the provisions upon them, yet they had, indeed, much the easier part; for in general, the women had only the care of managing, that is, spending what their husbands get; and that a woman had the name of subjection, indeed, but that they generally commanded, not the men only, but all they had; managed all for themselves; and where the man did his duty, the woman's life was all ease and tranquillity, and that she had nothing to do but to be easy, and to make all that were about her both easy and merry.

I returned, that while a woman was single, she was a masculine in her politic capacity; that she had then the full command of what she had, and the full direction of what she did; that she was a man in her separate capacity, to all intents and purposes that a man could be so to himself; that she was controlled by none, because accountable to none, and was in subjection to none: so I sung these two lines of Mr. ——'s:

“O! 'tis pleasant to be free,
The sweetest Miss is Liberty.”

I added, that whoever the woman was that had an estate, and would give it up to be the slave of a great man, that woman was a fool, and must be fit for nothing but a beggar; that it was my opinion a woman was as fit to govern and enjoy her own estate, without a man, as a man was without a woman; and that if she had a mind to gratify herself as to sexes, she might entertain a man as a man does a mistress; that while she was thus single she was her own, and if she gave away that power, she merited to be as miserable as it was possible that any creature could be.

All he could say could not answer the force of this as to argument, only this, that the other way was the ordinary method that the world was guided by; that he had reason to expect I should be content with that which all the world was contented with; that he was of the opinion, that a sincere affection between a man and his wife answered all the objections that I had made about the being a slave, a servant, and the like; and where there was a mutual love there could be no bondage, but that there was but one interest, one aim, one design, and all conspired to make both very happy.

Ay, said I, that is the thing I complain of. The pretence of affection takes from a woman everything that can be called herself; she is to have no interest, no aim, no view; but all is the interest, aim, and view, of the husband; she is to be the passive creature you spoke of, said I. She is to lead a life of perfect indolence, and living by faith (not in God, but) in her husband, she sinks or swims, as he is either fool or wise man, unhappy or prosperous; and in the middle of what she thinks is her happiness and prosperity, she is engulfed in misery and beggary, which she had not the least notice, knowledge, or suspicion of. How often have I seen a woman living in all the splendour that a plentiful fortune ought to allow her! with her coaches and equipages, her family and rich furniture, her attendants and friends, her visitors and good company, all about her to-day; to-morrow surprised with a disaster, turned out of all by a commission of bankrupt, stripped, to the clothes on her back; her jointure, suppose she had it, is sacrificed to the creditors, so long as her husband lived, and she turned into the street, and left to live on the charity of her friends, if she has any, or follow the monarch, her husband, into the Mint, and live there as the wreck of his fortunes, till he is forced to run away from her, even there ; and then she sees her children starve, herself miserable, breaks her heart, and cries herself to death ! This, says I, is the state of many a lady that has had ten thousand pounds to her portion.

He did not know how feelingly I spoke this, and what extremities I had gone through of this kind : how near I was to the very last article above, viz., crying myself to death ; and how I really starved for almost two years together.

But he shook his head, and said, Where had I lived ? and what dreadful families had I lived among, that had frightened me into such terrible apprehensions of things ? that these things indeed might happen where men run into hazardous things in trade, and without prudence or due consideration, launched their fortunes in a degree beyond their strength, grasping at adventures beyond their stocks, and the like ; but that, as he was stated in the world, if I would embark with him, he had a fortune equal with mine ; that together we should have no occasion of engaging in business any more, but that in any part of the world where I had a mind to live, whether England, France, Holland, or where I would, we might settle, and live as happily as the world could make any one live ; that if I desired the management of our estate, when put together, if I would not trust him with mine, he would trust me with his ; that we would be upon one bottom, and I should steer. Ay, says I, you'll allow me to steer, that is, hold the helm, but you'll con the ship, as they call it ; that is, as at sea, a boy serves to stand at the helm, but he that gives him the orders is pilot.

He laughed at my simile ; No, says he, you shall be pilot then, you shall con the ship. Ay, says I, as long as you please, but you can take the helm out of my hand when you please, and bid me go spin. It is not you, says I, that I suspect, but the laws of matrimony puts the power into your hands, bids you do it, commands you to command, and binds me, forsooth, to obey ; you, that are now upon even terms with me, and I with you, says I, are the next hour set up upon the throne, and the humble wife placed at your footstool : all the rest, all that you call oneness of interest, mutual affection, and the like, is courtesy and kindness then, and a woman is indeed infinitely obliged where she meets with it, but can't help herself where it fails.

Well, he did not give it over yet, but came to the serious part, and there he thought he should be too many for me; he first hinted that marriage was decreed by heaven; that it was the fixed state of life, which God had appointed for man's felicity, and for establishing a legal posterity; that there could be no legal claim of estates by inheritance, but by children born in wedlock; that all the rest was sunk under scandal and illegitimacy; and very well he talked upon that subject indeed.

But it would not do; I took him short there. Look you sir, said I, you have an advantage of me there indeed, in my particular case; but it would not be generous to make use of it. I readily grant that it were better for me to have married you, than to admit you to the liberty I have given you; but as I could not reconcile my judgment to marriage, for the reasons above, and had kindness enough for you, and obligation too much on me to resist you, I suffered your rudeness, and gave up my virtue; but I have two things before me to heal up that breach of honour without that desperate one of marriage, and those are, repentance for what is past, and putting an end to it for time to come.

He seemed to be concerned to think that I should take him in that manner; he assured me that I misunderstood him, that he had more manners as well as more kindness for me, and more justice than to reproach me with what he had been the aggressor in, and had surprised me into. That what he spoke referred to my words above, that the woman, if she thought fit, might entertain a man, as a man did a mistress; and that I seemed to mention that way of living as justifiable, and setting it as a lawful thing, and in the place of matrimony.

Well, we strained some compliments upon those points, not worth repeating; and I added, I supposed when he got to bed to me he thought himself sure of me; and, indeed, in the ordinary course of things, after he had lain with me he ought to think so, but that, upon the same foot of argument which I had discoursed with him upon, it was just the contrary; and when a woman had been weak enough to yield up the last point before wedlock, it would be adding one weakness to another to take the man afterwards, to pin down the shame of it upon herself all the days of her life, and bind herself to live all her time with the only man that could upbraid her with it. That in yielding at first, she must be a fool, but to take the man, is to be sure to be called fool; that to resist a man is to act with courage and vigour, and to cast off the reproach, which, in the course of things, drops out of knowledge and dies. The man goes one way and the woman another, as fate and the circumstances of living direct; and if they keep one another's counsel, the folly is heard no more of; but to take the man, says I, is the most preposterous thing in nature, and (saving your presence) is to befoul one's self, and live always in the smell of it. No, no, added I, after a man has lain with me as a mistress, he ought never to lie with me as a wife. That's not only preserving the crime in memory, but it is recording it in the family; in the woman marries the man afterwards, she bears the reproach of it to the last hour; if her husband is not a man of a hundred thousand, he some time or other upbraids her with it; if he has children, they fail not one way or other to hear of it: if the children are virtuous, they do their mother the justice to hate her for it; if they are wicked, they give her the mortification of doing the like, and giving her for the example. On the other hand, if the man and the woman part, there is an end of the crime, and an end of the clamour; time wears out the memory of it, or a woman may remove but a few streets, and she soon outlives it, and hears no more of it.

He was confounded at this discourse, and told me he could not say but I was right in the main. That as to that part relating to managing estates, it was arguing à la cavalier, it was in some sense right, if the women were able to carry it on so, but that in general the sex were not capable of it; their heads were not turned for it, and they had better choose a person capable and honest, that knew how to do them justice, as women, as well as to love them; and that then the trouble was all taken off of their hands.

I told him it was a dear way of purchasing their ease, for very often when the trouble was taken off of their hands, so was their money too; and that I thought it was far safer for the sex not to be afraid of the trouble, but to be really afraid of their money; that if nobody was trusted, nobody would be deceived; and the staff in their own hands was the best security in the world.

He replied, that I had started a new thing in the world; that however I might support it by subtle reasoning, yet it was a way of arguing that was contrary to the general practise, and that he confessed he was much disappointed in it: that had he known I would have made such a use of it, he would never have attempted what he did, which he had no wicked design in, resolving to make me reparation, and that he was very sorry he had been so unhappy; that he was very sure he should never upbraid me with it hereafter, and had so good an opinion of me as to believe I did not suspect him; but seeing I was positive in refusing him, notwithstanding what had passed, he had nothing to do but secure me from reproach, by going back again to Paris, that so, according to my own way of arguing, it might die out of memory, and I might never meet with it again to my disadvantage.

I was not pleased with this part at all, for I had no mind to let him go neither; and yet I had no mind to give him such hold of me as he would have had; and thus I was in a kind of suspense, irresolute, and doubtful what course to take.

I was in the house with him, as I have observed, and I saw evidently that he was preparing to go back to Paris; and particularly, I found he was remitting money to Paris, which was, as I understood afterwards, to pay for some wines, which he had given order to have bought for him at Troyes in Champagne: and I knew not what course to take; and besides that I was very loath to part with him, I found also that I was with child by him, which was what I had not yet told him of; and sometimes I thought not to tell him of it at all; but I was in a strange place, and had no acquaintance, though I had a great deal of substance, which indeed, having no friends there, was the more dangerous to me.

This obliged me to take him one morning, when I saw him, as I thought, a little anxious about his going, and irresolute; says I to him, I fancy you can hardly find in your heart to leave me now. The more unkind is it in you, said he, severely unkind, to refuse a man that knows not how to part with you.

I am so far from being unkind to you, said I, that I will go over all the world with you if you desired me, except to Paris, where you know I can't go.

It is pity so much love, said he, on both sides, should ever separate.

Why then, said I, do you go away from me ?

Because, said he, you won't take me.

But if I won't take you, said I, you may take me anywhere but to Paris.

He was very loath to go anywhere, he said, without me ; but he must go to Paris or to the East Indies.

I told him I did not use to court, but I durst venture myself to the East Indies with him, if there was a necessity of his going.

He told me, God be thanked, he was in no necessity of going anywhere, but that he had a tempting invitation to go to the Indies.

I answered, I would say nothing to that : but that I desired he would go anywhere but to Paris, because there he knew I must not go.

He said he had no remedy but to go where I could not go ; for he could not bear to see me, if he must not have me.

I told him that was the unkindest thing he could say of me, and that I ought to take it very ill, seeing I knew how very well to oblige him to stay, without yielding to what he knew I could not yield to.

This amazed him, and he told me I was pleased to be mysterious ; but that he was sure it was in nobody's power to hinder him going, if he resolved upon it, except me, who had influence enough upon him to make him do anything.

Yes, I told him I could hinder him, because I knew he could no more do an unkind thing by me than he could do an unjust one ; and to put him out of his pain, I told him I was with child.

He came to me, and taking me in his arms, and kissing me a thousand times almost, said, Why would I be so unkind not to tell him that before.

I told him 'twas hard, that to have him stay, I should be forced to do as criminals do to avoid the gallows, plead my belly ; and that I thought I had given him testimonies enough of an affection equal to that of a wife, if I had not only lain with him, been with child by him, shown myself unwilling to part with him, but offered to go to the East Indies with him ; and except one thing that I could not grant, what could he ask more.

He stood mute a good while, but afterwards told me, he had a great deal more to say, if I could assure him that I would not take ill whatever freedom he might use with me in his discourse.

I told him he might use any freedom in words with me; for a woman who had given leave to such other freedoms, as I had done, had left herself no room to take anything ill, let it be what it would.

Why then, he said, I hope you believe, madam, I was born a Christian, and that I have some sense of sacred things upon my mind. When I first broke in upon my own virtue and assaulted yours; when I surprised, and, as it were, forced you to that which neither you intended or I designed but a few hours before; it was upon a presumption that you would certainly marry me, if once I could go that length with you and it was with an honest resolution to make you my wife.

But I have been surprised with such a denial that no woman in such circumstances ever gave to a man; for certainly it was never known that any woman refused to marry a man that had first lain with her, much less a man that had gotten her with child; but you go upon different notions from all the world, and though you reason upon it so strongly that a man knows hardly what to answer, yet I must own there is something in it shocking to nature, and something very unkind to yourself; but above all, it is unkind to the child that is yet unborn, who, if we marry will come into the world with advantage enough, but if not, is ruined before it is born; must bear the eternal reproach of what it is not guilty of; must be branded from its cradle with a mark of infamy; be loaded with the crimes and follies of its parents, and suffer for sins that it never committed. This I take to be very hard, and, indeed, cruel to the poor infant not yet born, who you cannot think of with any patience, if you have the common affection of a mother, and not do that for it which should at once place it on a level with the rest of the world, and not leave it to curse its parents for what also we ought to be ashamed of. I cannot, therefore, says he, but beg and entreat you, as you are a Christian and a mother, not to let the innocent lamb you go with be ruined before it is born, and leave it to curse and reproach us hereafter, for what may be so easily avoided.

Then, dear madam, said he, with a world of tenderness (and I thought I saw tears in his eyes), allow me to repeat it, that I am a Christian, and consequently I do not allow what I have rashly, and without due consideration, done ; I say, I do not approve of it as lawful, and therefore, though I did, with the view I have mentioned, one unjustifiable action, I cannot say that I could satisfy myself to live in a continual practice of what in judgment we must both condemn ; and though I love you above all the women in the world, and have done enough to convince you of it, by resolving to marry you after what has passed between us, and by offering to quit all pretensions to any part of your estate, so that I should, as it were, take a wife after I had lain with her, and without a farthing portion, which as my circumstances are, I need not do ; I say, notwithstanding my affection to you, which is inexpressible, yet I cannot give up soul as well as body, the interest of this world, and the hopes of another ; and you cannot call this my disrespect to you.

If ever any man in the world was truly valuable for the strictest honesty of intention, this was the man ; and if ever woman in her senses rejected a man of merit on so trivial and frivolous a pretence, I was the woman : but surely it was the most preposterous thing that ever woman did.

He would have taken me as a wife, but would not entertain me as a whore. Was ever woman angry with any gentleman on that head ? And was ever woman so stupid to choose to be a whore, where she might have been an honest wife ? but infatuations are next to being possessed of the devil. I was inflexible, and pretended to argue upon the point of a woman's liberty as before, but he took me short, and with more warmth than he had yet used with me, though with the utmost respect, replied, Dear madam, you argue for liberty, at the same time that you restrain yourself from that liberty which God and nature has directed you to take ; and to supply the deficiency, propose a vicious liberty, which is neither honourable, or religious. Will you propose liberty at the expense of modesty ?

I returned, that he mistook me : I did not propose it ; I only said that those that could not be content without concerning the sexes in that affair, might do so indeed ; might entertain a man as men do a mistress, if they thought fit, but he did not hear me say I would do so ; and though, by what had passed, he might well censure me in that part, yet he should find, for the future, that I should freely converse with him without any inclination that way.

He told me he could not promise that for himself, and thought he ought not to trust himself with the opportunity, for that, as he had failed already, he was loath to lead himself into the temptation of offending again, and that this was the true reason of his resolving to go back to Paris; not that he could willingly leave me, and would be very far from wanting my invitation; but if he could not stay upon terms that became him, either as an honest man or a Christian, what could he do? And he hoped, he said, I could not blame him, that he was unwilling anything that was to call him father should upbraid him with leaving him in the world to be called bastard; adding, that he was astonished to think how I could satisfy myself to be so cruel to an innocent infant not yet born; professed he could neither bear the thoughts of it, much less bear to see it, and hoped I would not take it ill that he could not stay to see me delivered, for that very reason.

I saw he spoke this with a disturbed mind, and that it was with some difficulty that he restrained his passion, so I declined any farther discourse upon it; only said I hoped he would consider of it. O madam, says he, do not bid me consider, 'tis for you to consider; and with that he went out of the room, in a strange kind of confusion, as was easy to be seen in his countenance.

If I had not been one of the foolishest as well as wickedest creatures upon earth, I could never have acted thus. I had one of the honestest, completest gentlemen upon earth, at my hand. He had in one sense saved my life, but he had saved that life from ruin in a most remarkable manner. He loved me even to distraction, and had come from Paris to Rotterdam on purpose to seek me. He had offered me marriage, even after I was with child by him, and had offered to quit all his pretensions to my estate, and give it up to my own management, having a plentiful estate of his own. Here I might have settled myself out of the reach even of disaster itself; his estate and mine would have purchased even then above two thousand pounds a year, and I might have lived like a queen, nay, far more happy than a queen; and, which was above all, I had now an opportunity to have quitted a life of crime and debauchery, which I had been given up to for several years, and to have sat down quiet in plenty and honour, and to have set myself apart to the great work which I have since seen so much necessity of and occasion for, I mean that of repentance.

But my measure of wickedness was not yet full. I continued obstinate against matrimony, and yet I could not bear the thoughts of his going away neither. As to the child, I was not very anxious about it. I told him I would promise him it should never come to him to upbraid him with its being illegitimate? that if it was a boy, I would breed it up like the son of a gentleman, and use it well for his sake; and after a little more such talk as this, and seeing him resolved to go, I retired, but could not help letting him see the tears run down my cheeks; he came to me and kissed me, entreated me, conjured me by the kindness he had shown me in my distress, by the justice he had done me in my bills and money affairs, by the respect which made him refuse a thousand pistoles from me for his expenses with that traitor the Jew, by the pledge of our misfortunes, so he called it, which I carried with me, and by all that the sincerest affection could propose to do, that I would not drive him away.

But it would not do: I was stupid and senseless, deaf to all his importunities, and continued so to the last. So we parted, only desiring me to promise that I would write him word when I was delivered, and how he might give me an answer; and this I engaged my word I would do. And upon his desiring to be informed which way I intended to dispose of myself, I told him I resolved to go directly to England, and to London, where I proposed to lie in; but since he resolved to leave me, I told him I supposed it would be of no consequence to him what became of me.

He lay in his lodgings that night, but went away early in the morning, leaving me a letter, in which he repeated all he had said, recommended the care of the child, and desired of me that as he had remitted to me the offer of a thousand pistoles, which I would have given him for the recompense of his charges and trouble with the Jew, and had given it me back; so he desired I would allow him to oblige me to set apart that thousand pistoles, with its improvement, for the child, and for its education; earnestly pressing me to secure that little portion for the abandoned orphan, when I should think fit, as he was sure I would, to throw away the rest upon something as worthless as my sincere friend at Paris. He concluded with moving me to reflect, with the same regret as he did, on our follies we had committed together; asked me forgiveness for being the aggressor in the fact, and forgave me everything, he said, but the cruelty of refusing him, which he owned he could not forgive me so heartily as he should do, because he was satisfied it was an injury to myself, would be an introduction to my ruin, and that I would seriously repent of it. He foretold some fatal things, which, he said, he was well assured I should fall into, and that at last I would be ruined by a bad husband; bid me be the more wary, that I might render him a false prophet; but to remember, that if ever I came into distress, I had a fast friend at Paris, who would not upbraid me with the unkind things past, but would be always ready to return me good for evil.

This letter stunned me. I could not think it possible for any one that had not dealt with the devil to write such a letter, for he spoke of some particular things which afterwards were to befall me, with such an assurance that it frightened me beforehand; and when those things did come to pass, I was persuaded he had some more than human knowledge. In a word, his advices to me to repent were very affectionate, his warnings of evil to happen to me were very kind, and his promise of assistance, if I wanted him, were so generous, that I have seldom seen the like; and though I did not at first set much by that part, because I looked upon them as what might not happen, and as what was improbable to happen, at that time, yet all the rest of his letter was so moving that it left me very melancholy, and I cried four-and-twenty hours after almost without ceasing about it; and yet even all this while, whatever it was that bewitched me, I had not one serious wish that I had taken him. I wished heartily, indeed, that I could have kept him with me, but I had a mortal aversion to marrying him, or indeed, anybody else, but formed a thousand wild notions in my head that I was yet gay enough, and young and handsome enough to please a man of quality, and that I would try my fortune at London, come of it what would.

Thus blinded by my own vanity, I threw away the only opportunity I then had to have effectually settled my fortunes, and secured them for this world: and I am a memorial to all that shall read my story, a standing monument of the madness and distraction which pride and intuations from hell runs us into, how ill our passions guide us, and how dangerously we act when we follow the dictates of an ambitious mind.

I was rich, beautiful, and agreeable, and not yet old. I had known something of the influence I had had upon the fancies of men, even of the highest rank. I never forgot that the Prince de —— had said with an ecstasy that I was the finest woman in France, I knew I could make a figure at London, and how well I could grace that figure. I was not at a loss how to behave, and having already been adored by princes, I thought of nothing less than of being mistress to the king himself. But I go back to my immediate circumstances at that time.

I got over the absence of my honest merchant but slowly at first: it was with infinite regret that I let him go at all; and when I read the letter he left I was quite confounded: as soon as he was out of call, and irrecoverable, I would have given half I had in the world for him back again, my notions of things changed in an instant, and I called myself a thousand fools for casting myself upon a life of scandal and hazard; when, after the shipwreck of virtue, honour, and principle, and sailing at the utmost risk in the stormy seas of crime, and abominable levity, I had a safe harbour presented, and no heart to cast anchor in it.

His predictions terrified me, his promises of kindness if I came to distress melted me into tears, but frightened me with the apprehensions of ever coming into such distress, and filled my head with a thousand anxieties and thoughts how it should be possible for me, who had now such a fortune, to sink again into misery.

Then the dreadful scene of my life, when I was left with my five children, &c., as I have related, represented itself again to me, and I sat considering what measures I might take to bring myself to such a state of desolation again, and how I should act to avoid it.

But these things wore off gradually. As to my friend, the merchant, he was gone, and gone irrecoverably, for I durst not follow him to Paris for the reasons mentioned above. Again, I was afraid to write to him to return, lest he should have refused, as I verily believed he would; so I sat and cried intolerably for some days, nay, I may say, for some weeks; but I say, it wore off gradually, and as I had a pretty deal of business for managing my effects, the hurry of that particular part served to divert my thoughts, and in part to wear out the impressions which had been made upon my mind.

I had sold my jewels, all but the fine diamond ring which my gentleman the jeweller used to wear, and this, at proper times, I wore myself; as also the diamond necklace which the prince had given me, and a pair of extraordinary earrings, worth about 600 pistoles; the other, which was a fine casket, he left with me at his going to Versailles, and a small case with some rubies and emeralds, &c. I say I sold them at the Hague for 7,600 pistoles. I had received all the bills which the merchant had helped me to at Paris, and with the money I brought with me, they made up 13,900 pistoles more; so that I had in ready money, and in account in the bank at Amsterdam, above one and twenty thousand pistoles, besides jewels; and how to get this treasure to England was my next care.

The business I had had now with a great many people for receiving such large sums, and selling jewels of such considerable value, gave me opportunity to know and converse with several of the best merchants of the place; so that I wanted no direction now how to get my money remitted to England. Applying therefore to several merchants, that I might neither risk it all on the credit of one merchant, nor suffer any single man to know the quantity of money I had; I say, applying myself to several merchants, I got bills of exchange payable in London for all my money. The first bills I took with me, the second bills I left in trust (in case of any disaster at sea) in the hands of the first merchant, him to whom I was recommended by my friend from Paris.

Having thus spent nine months in Holland, refused the best offer ever woman in my circumstances had, parted unkindly, and indeed barbarously, with the best friend and honestest man in the world, got all my money in my pocket, and a bastard in my belly, I took shipping at the Briel in the packet-boat, and arrived safe at Harwich, where my woman, Amy, was come, by my direction, to meet me.

I would willingly have given ten thousand pounds of my money to have been rid of the burthen I had in my belly, as above; but it could not be, so I was obliged to bear with that part, and get rid of it by the ordinary method of patience and a hard travail.

I was above the contemptible usage that women in my circumstances oftentimes meet with. I had considered all that beforehand; and having sent Amy beforehand, and remitted her money to do it, she had taken me a very handsome house in — street, near Charing-cross; had hired me two maids and a footman, who she had put in a good livery; and having hired a glass coach and four horses, she came with them and the man-servant to Harwich to meet me, and had been there near a week before I came: so I had nothing to do but to go away to London to my own house, where I arrived in very good health, and where I passed for a French lady, by the title of —.

My first business was to get all my bills accepted, which, to cut the story short, was all both accepted and currently paid; and I then resolved to take me a country lodging somewhere near the town, to be incognito, till I was brought to bed; which, appearing in such a figure, and having such an equipage, I easily managed without anybody's offering the usual insults of parish inquiries. I did not appear in my new house for some time, and afterwards I thought fit, for particular reasons, to quit that house, and not come to it at all, but take handsome large apartments in the Pall Mall, in a house out of which was a private door into the king's garden, by the permission of the chief gardener, who had lived in the house.

I had now all my effects secured; but my money being my great concern at that time, I found it a difficulty how to dispose of it so as to bring me in an annual interest. However, in some time I got a substantial safe mortgage for 14,000*l.*, by the assistance of the famous Sir Robert Clayton, for which I had an estate of 1,800*l.* a year bound to me; and had 700*l.* per annum interest for it.

This, with some other securities, made me a very handsome estate of above a thousand pounds a year; enough, one would think, to keep any woman in England from being a whore.

I lay in at —, about four miles from London, and brought a fine boy into the world, and according to my promise sent an account of it to my friend at Paris, the father of it; and in the letter told him how sorry I was for his going away, and did as good as intimate, that if he would come once more to see me, I should use him better than I had done. He gave me a very kind and obliging answer, but took not the least notice of what I had said of his coming over, so I found my interest lost there for ever. He gave me joy of the child, and hinted that he hoped I would make good what he had begged for the poor infant as I had promised, and I sent him word again that I would fulfil his order to a tittle; and such a fool, and so weak I was in this last letter, notwithstanding what I have said of his not taking notice of my invitation, as to ask his pardon almost for the usage I gave him at Rotterdam, and stooped so low as to expostulate with him for not taking notice of my inviting him to come to me again, as I had done; and which was still more, went so far as to make a second sort of an offer to him, telling him, almost in plain words, that if he would come over now, I would have him; but he never gave me the least reply to it at all, which was as absolute a denial to me as he was ever able to give; so I sat down, I cannot say contented, but vexed heartily that I had made the offer at all, for he had, as I may say, his full revenge of me in scorning to answer, and to let me twice ask that of him, which he with so much importunity begged of me before.

I was now up again, and soon came to my city lodging in the Pall Mall, and here I began to make a figure suitable to my estate, which was very great; and I shall give you an account of my equipage in a few words, and of myself too.

I paid 60*l.* a year for my new apartments, for I took them by the year, but then they were handsome lodgings indeed, and very richly furnished. I kept my own servants to clean and look after them, found my own kitchenware and firing. My equipage was handsome, but not very great; I had a coach, a coachman, a footman, my woman Amy, who I now dressed like a gentlewoman, and made her my companion, and three maids; and thus I lived for a time. I dressed to the height of every mode, went extremely rich in clothes, and as for jewels, I wanted none. I gave a very good livery, laced with silver, and as rich as anybody below the nobility could be seen with; and thus I appeared, leaving the world to guess who or what I was, without offering to put myself forward.

I walked sometimes in the Mall with my woman Amy, but I kept no company, and made no acquaintances, only made as gay a show as I was able to do, and that upon all occasions. I found, however, the world was not altogether so unconcerned about me as I seemed to be about them; and first I understood that the neighbours begun to be mighty inquisitive about me, as who I was? and what my circumstances were?

Amy was the only person that could answer their curiosity, or give any account of me; and she, a tattling woman and a true gossip, took care to do that with all the art that she was mistress of. She let them know that I was the widow of a person of quality in France, that I was very rich, that I came over hither to look after an estate that fell to me by some of my relations who died here, that I was worth 40,000*l.* all in my own hands, and the like.

This was all wrong in Amy, and in me too, though we did not see it at first, for this recommended me indeed to those sort of gentlemen they call fortune-hunters, and who always besieged ladies, as they called it, on purpose to take them prisoners, as I called it, that is to say, to marry the women, and have the spending of their money. But if I was wrong in refusing the honourable proposals of the Dutch merchant, who offered me the disposal of my whole estate, and had as much of his own to maintain me with; I was right now in refusing those offers which came generally from gentlemen of good families and good estates, but who living to the extent of them, were always needy and necessitous, and wanted a sum of money to make themselves easy, as they call it, that is to say, to pay off incumbrances, sisters' portions, and the like; and then the woman is prisoner for life, and may live as they please to give her leave. This life I had seen into clearly enough, and therefore I was not to be caught that way. However, as I said, the reputation of my money brought several of those sort of gentry about me, and they found means, by one stratagem or other, to get access to my ladyship; but in short, I answered them all well enough, that I lived single and was happy; that as I had no occasion to change my condition for an estate, so I did not see that by the best offer that any of them could make me, I could mend my fortune; that I might be honoured with titles indeed, and in time rank on public occasions with the peeresses (I mention that, because one that offered at me was the eldest son of a peer), but that I was as well without the title as long as I had the estate, and while I had 2,000*l.* a year of my own, I was happier than I could be in being prisoner of state to a nobleman, for I took the ladies of that rank to be little better.

As I have mentioned Sir Robert Clayton, with whom I had the good fortune to become acquainted, on account of the mortgage which he helped me to, it is necessary to take notice that I had much advantage in my ordinary affairs by his advice, and therefore I called it my good fortune; for as he paid me so considerable an annual income as 700*l.* a year, so I am to acknowledge myself much a debtor, not only to the justice of his dealings with me, but to the prudence and conduct which he guided me to, by his advice, for the management of my estate; and as he found I was not inclined to marry, he frequently took occasion to hint how soon I might raise my fortune to a prodigious height, if I would but order my family economy so far within my revenue as to lay up every year something to add to the capital.

I was convinced of the truth of what he said, and agreed to the advantages of it. You are to take it as you go, that Sir Robert supposed by my own discourse, and especially by my woman Amy, that I had 2,000*l.* a year income. He judged, as he said, by my way of living, that I could not spend above one thousand; and so, he added, I might prudently lay by 1,000*l.* every year to add to the capital; and by adding every year the additional interest or income of the money to the capital, he proved to me, that in ten years I should double the 1,000*l.* per annum that I laid by; and he drew me out a table, as he called it, of the increase, for me to judge by; and by which, he said, if the gentlemen of England would but act so, every family of them would increase their fortunes to a great degree, just as merchants do by trade; whereas now, says Sir Robert, by the humour of living up to the extent of their fortunes, and rather beyond, the gentlemen, says he, ay, and the nobility too, are almost all of them borrowers, and all in necessitous circumstances.

As Sir Robert frequently visited me, and was (if I may say so from his own mouth) very well pleased with my way of conversing with him, for he knew nothing, nor so much as guessed at what I had been; I say, as he came often to see me, so he always entertained me with this scheme of frugality; and one time he brought another paper, wherein he showed me, much to the same purpose as the former, to what degree I should increase my estate if I would come into his method of contracting my expenses; and by this scheme of his, it appeared, that laying up a thousand pounds a year, and every year adding the interest to it, I should in twelve years' time have in bank one-and-twenty thousand and fifty-eight pounds, after which I might lay up two thousand pounds a year.

I objected that I was a young woman, that I had been used to live plentifully, and with a good appearance, and that I knew not how to be a miser.

He told me that if I thought I had enough it was well, but that if I desired to have more, this was the way; that in another twelve years I should be too rich, so that I should not know what to do with it.

Ay, sir, says I, you are contriving how to make me a rich old woman, but that won't answer my end, I had rather have 20,000*l.* now than 60,000*l.* when I am fifty years old.

Then, madam, says he, I suppose your honour has no children?

None, Sir Robert, said I, but what are provided for; so I left him in the dark as much as I found him. However, I considered his scheme very well, though I said no more to him at that time, and I resolved, though I would make a very good figure, I say, I resolved to abate a little of my expense, and draw in, live closer, and save something, if not so much as he proposed to me. It was near the end of the year that Sir Robert made this proposal to me, and when the year was up, I went to his house in the city, and there I told him I came to thank him for his scheme of frugality; that I had been studying much upon it, and though I had not been able to mortify myself so much as to lay up a thousand pounds a year, yet, as I had not come to him for my interest half-yearly as was usual, I was now come to let him know that I had resolved to lay up that seven hundred pounds a year, and never use a penny of it, desiring him to help me to put it out to advantage.

Sir Robert, a man thoroughly versed in arts of improving money, but thoroughly honest, said to me, Madam, I am glad you approve of the method that I proposed to you; but you have begun wrong, you should have come for your interest at the half-year, and then you had had the money to put out; now you have lost half a year's interest of 350*l.*, which is 9*l.*; for I had but 5 per cent. on the mortgage.

Well, well, sir, says I, can you put this out for me now?

Let it lie, madam, says he, till the next year, and then I'll put out your 1,400*l.* together, and in the mean time I'll pay you interest for the 700*l.* So he gave me his bill for the money, which he told me should be no less than 6*l.* per cent. Sir Robert Clayton's bill was what nobody would refuse, so I thanked him and let it lie; and next year I did the same, and the third year Sir Robert got me a good mortgage for 2,200*l.* at 6*l.* per cent. interest; so I had 132*l.* a year added to my income, which was a very satisfying article.

But I return to my history. As I have said, I found that my measures were all wrong; the posture I set up in exposed me to innumerable visitors of the kind I have mentioned above. I was cried up for a vast fortune, and one that Sir Robert Clayton managed for; and Sir Robert Clayton was courted for me, as much as I was for myself. But I had given Sir Robert his cue; I had told him my opinion of matrimony, in just the same terms as I had done my merchant, and he came into it presently; he owned that my observation was just, and that if I valued my liberty, as I knew my fortune, and that it was in my own hands, I was to blame if I gave it away to any one.

But Sir Robert knew nothing of my design; that I aimed at being a kept mistress, and to have a handsome maintenance; and that I was still for getting money, and laying it up too, as much as he could desire me, only by a worse way.

However, Sir Robert came seriously to me one day, and told me he had an offer of matrimony to make to me that was beyond all that he had heard had offered themselves, and this was a merchant. Sir Robert and I agreed exactly in our notions of a merchant. Sir Robert said, and I found it to be true, that a true-bred merchant is the best gentleman in the nation; that in knowledge, in manners, in judgment of things, the merchant outdid many of the nobility; that having once mastered the world, and being above the demand of business, though no real estate, they were then superior to most gentlemen, even in estate; that a merchant in flush business and a capital stock is able to spend more money than a gentleman of 5,000*l.* a year estate; that while a merchant spent, he only spent what he got, and not that; and that he laid up great sums every year.

That an estate is a pond; but that a trade was a spring; that if the first is once mortgaged, it seldom gets clear, but embarrassed the person for ever; but the merchant had his estate continually flowing; and upon this he named me merchants who lived in more real splendour, and spent more money than most of the noblemen in England could singly expend, and that they still grew immensely rich.

He went on to tell me, that even the tradesmen in London, speaking of the better sort of trades, could spend more money in their families, and yet give better fortunes to their children than, generally speaking, the gentry of England from 1,000*l.* a year downward could do, and yet grow rich too.

The upshot of all this was to recommend to me rather the bestowing my fortune upon some eminent merchant, who lived already in the first figure of a merchant, and who, not being in want or scarcity of money, but having a flourishing business and a flowing cash, would at the first word settle all my fortune on myself and children, and maintain me like a queen.

This was certainly right; and had I taken his advice, I had been really happy; but my heart was bent upon an independency of fortune, and I told him I knew no state of matrimony but what was, at best, a state of inferiority, if not of bondage; that I had no notion of it; that I lived a life of absolute liberty now, was free as I was born, and having a plentiful fortune, I did not understand what coherence the words honour and obey had with the liberty of a free woman; that I knew no reason the men had to engross the whole liberty of the race, and make the women, notwithstanding any disparity of fortune, be subject to the laws of marriage, of their own making; that it was my misfortune to be a woman, but I was resolved it should not be made worse by the sex; and, seeing liberty seemed to be the men's property, I would be a man-woman, for, as I was born free, I would die so.

Sir Robert smiled, and told me I talked a kind of Amazonian language; that he found few women of my mind, or that, if they were, they wanted resolution to go on with it; that notwithstanding all my notions, which he could not but say had once some weight in them, yet he understood I had broke in upon them, and had been married. I answered, I had so; but he did not hear me say that I had any encouragement from what was past to make a second venture; that I was got well out of the toil, and if I came in again, I should have nobody to blame but myself.

Sir Robert laughed heartily at me, but gave over offering any more arguments, only told me he had pointed me out for some of the best merchants in London, but since I forbid him he would give me no disturbance of that kind; he applauded my way of managing my money, and told me I should soon be monstrous rich; but he neither knew or mistrusted that, with all this wealth; I was yet a whore, and was not averse to adding to my estate at the farther expense of my virtue.

But to go on with my story as to my way of living. I found, as above, that my living as I did would not answer; that it only brought the fortune-hunters and bites about me, as I have said before, to make a prey of me and my money; and in short, I was harassed with lovers, beaux, and fops of quality, in abundance, but it would not do. I aimed at other things, and was possessed with so vain an opinion of my own beauty, that nothing less than the king himself was in my eye; and this vanity was raised by some words let fall by a person I conversed with, who was, perhaps, likely enough to have brought such a thing to pass, had it been sooner; but that game began to be pretty well over at court. However, the having mentioned such a thing, it seems a little too publicly, it brought abundance of people about me, upon a wicked account too.

And now I began to act in a new sphere. The court was exceedingly gay and fine, though fuller of men than of women, the queen not affecting to be very much in public. On the other hand, it is no slander upon the courtiers to say, they were as wicked as anybody in reason could desire them. The king had several mistresses, who were prodigious fine, and there was a glorious show on that side indeed. If the sovereign gave himself a-loose, it could not be expected the rest of the court should be all saints; so far was it from that, though I would not make it worse than it was, that a woman that had anything agreeable in her appearance could never want followers.

I soon found myself thronged with admirers, and I received visits from some persons of very great figure, who always introduced themselves by the help of an old lady or two, who were now become my intimates; and one of them, I understood afterwards, was set to work on purpose to get into my favour, in order to introduce what followed.

The conversation we had was generally courtly, but civil: at length some gentlemen proposed to play, and made what they called a party. This, it seems, was a contrivance of one of my female hangers-on, for, as I said, I had two of them, who thought this was the way to introduce people as often as she pleased; and so indeed it was. They played high and stayed late, but begged my pardon, only asked leave to make an appointment for the next night. I was as gay and as well pleased as any of them, and one night told one of the gentlemen, my Lord —, that seeing they were doing me the honour of diverting themselves at my apartment, and desired to be there sometimes, I did not keep a gaming-table, but I would give them a little ball the next day if they pleased; which they accepted very willingly.

Accordingly, in the evening, the gentlemen began to come, where I let them see that I understood very well what such things meant. I had a large dining-room in my apartments, with five other rooms on the same floor, all which I made drawing-rooms for the occasion, having all the beds taken down for the day. In three of these I had tables placed, covered with wine and sweetmeats, the fourth had a green table for play, and the fifth was my own room, where I sat, and where I received all the company that came to pay their compliments to me. I was dressed, you may be sure, to all the advantage possible, and had all the jewels on that I was mistress of. My Lord —, to whom I had made the invitation, sent me a set of fine music from the playhouse, and the ladies danced, and we began to be very merry, when, about eleven o'clock, I had notice given me that there were some gentlemen coming in masquerade. I seemed a little surprised, and began to apprehend some disturbance, when, my Lord — perceiving it, spoke to me to be easy, for that there was a party of the guards at the door, which should be ready to prevent any rudeness; and another gentleman gave me a hint, as if the king was among the masks. I coloured as red as blood itself could make a face look, and expressed a great surprise; however, there was no going back, so I kept my station in my drawing-room, but with the folding-doors wide open.

A while after, the masks came in, and began with a dance a la comique, performing wonderfully indeed. While they were dancing, I withdrew, and left a lady to answer for me that I would return immediately. In less than half an hour I returned, dressed in the habit of a Turkish princess; the habit I got at Leghorn, when my foreign prince bought me a Turkish slave, as I have said. The Maltese man-of-war had, it seems, taken a Turkish vessel going from Constantinople to Alexandria, in which were some ladies bound for Grand Cairo in Egypt; and as the ladies were made slaves, so their fine clothes were thus exposed; and with this Turkish slave I bought the rich clothes too. The dress was extraordinary fine indeed: I had bought it as a curiosity, having never seen the like. The robe was a fine Persian or India damask, the ground white, and the flowers blue and gold, and the train held five yards. The dress under it was a vest of the same, embroidered with gold, and set with some pearl in the work, and some turquoise stones. To the vest was a girdle five or six inches wide, after the Turkish mode; and on both ends where it joined, or hooked, was set with diamonds, for eight inches either way, only they were not true diamonds, but nobody knew that but myself.

The turban, or headdress, had a pinnacle on the top, but not above five inches, with a piece of loose sarcenet hanging from it; and on the front, just over the forehead, was a good jewel, which I had added to it.

This habit, as above, cost me about sixty pistoles in Italy, but cost much more in the country from whence it came; and little did I think, when I bought it, that I should put it to such a use as this, though I had dressed myself in it many times by the help of my little Turk, and afterwards between Amy and I, only to see how I looked in it. I had sent her up before to get it ready, and when I came up I had nothing to do but slip it on, and was down in my drawing-room in a little more than a quarter of an hour. When I came there, the room was full of company, but I ordered the folding-doors to be shut for a minute or two, till I had received the compliments of the ladies that were in the room, and had given them a full view of my dress.

But my Lord —, who happened to be in the room, slipped out at another door, and brought back with him one of the masks, a tall, well-shaped person, but who had no name, being all masked, nor would it have been allowed to ask any person's name on such an occasion. The person spoke in French to me, that it was the finest dress he had ever seen; and asked me if he should have the honour to dance with me. I bowed, as giving my consent, but said, as I had been a Mahometan, I could not dance after the manner of this country; I supposed their music would not play à la Moresque. He answered merrily, I had a Christian's face, and he'd venture it that I could dance like a Christian; adding, that so much beauty could not be Mahometan. Immediately the folding-doors were flung open, and he led me into the room. The company were under the greatest surprise imaginable; the very music stopped awhile to gaze, for the dress was indeed exceedingly surprising, perfectly new, very agreeable, and wonderful rich.

The gentleman, whoever he was, for I never knew, led me only a courant, and then asked me if I had a mind to dance an antic, that is to say, whether I would dance the antic as they had danced in masquerade, or anything by myself. I told him anything else rather, if he pleased; so we danced only two French dances, and he led me to the drawing-room door, when he retired to the rest of the masks. When he left me at the drawing-room door I did not go in, as he thought I would have done, but turned about, and showed myself to the whole room, and, calling my woman to me, gave her some directions to the music, by which the company presently understood that I would give them a dance by myself. Immediately all the house rose up and paid me a kind of a compliment by removing back every way to make me room, for the place was exceedingly full. The music did not at first hit the tune that I directed, which was a French tune, so I was forced to send my woman to 'em again, standing all this while at my drawing-room door; but as soon as my woman spoke to them again they played it right, and I, to let them see it was so, stepped forward to the middle of the room. Then they began it again, and I danced by myself a figure which I learnt in France, when the Prince de —— desired I would dance for his diversion. It was, indeed, a very fine figure, invented by a famous master at Paris, for a lady or a gentleman to dance single; but being perfectly new, it pleased the company exceedingly, and they all thought it had been Turkish; nay, one gentleman had the folly to expose himself so much as to say, and I think swore too, that he had seen it danced at Constantinople, which was ridiculous enough.

At the finishing the dance the company clapped, and almost shouted; and one of the gentlemen cried out "Roxana! Roxana! by ——," with an oath; upon which foolish accident I had the name of Roxana presently fixed upon me all over the court end of town, as effectually as if I had been christened Roxana. I had, it seems, the felicity of pleasing everybody that night to an extreme; and my ball, but especially my dress, was the chat of the town for that week; and so the name of Roxana was the toast at and about the court, no other health was to be named with it.

Now things began to work as I would have them, and I began to be very popular, as much I could desire. The ball held till (as well as I was pleased with the show) I was sick of the night; the gentlemen masked, went off about three o'clock in the morning; the other gentlemen sat down to play; the music held it out; and some of the ladies were dancing at six in the morning.

But I was mighty eager to know who it was danced with me; some of the lords went so far as to tell me I was very much honoured in my company; one of them spoke so broad as almost to say it was the king, but I was convinced afterwards it was not; and another replied, if he had been his majesty he should have thought it no dishonour to lead up a Roxana; but to this hour I never knew positively who it was; and by his behaviour I thought he was too young, his majesty being at that time in an age that might be discovered from a young person, even in his dancing.

Be that as it would, I had five hundred guineas sent me the next morning, and the messenger was ordered to tell me that the persons who sent it desired a ball again at my lodgings on the next Tuesday, but that they would have my leave to give the entertainment themselves. I was mighty well pleased with this, to be sure, but very inquisitive to know who the money came from, but the messenger was silent as death as to that point, and bowing always at my inquiries, begged me to ask no questions which he could not give an obliging answer to.

I forgot to mention, that the gentlemen that played gave a hundred guineas to the box, as they called it; and at the end of their play they asked for my gentlewoman of the bedchamber, as they called her (Mrs. Amy, forsooth), and gave it her, and gave twenty guineas more among the servants.

These magnificent doings equally both pleased and surprised me, and I hardly knew where I was; but especially that notion of the king being the person that danced with me, puffed me up to that degree, that I not only did not know anybody else, but indeed was very far from knowing myself.

I had now, the next Tuesday, to provide for the like company; but, alas! it was all taken out of my hand; three gentlemen, who yet were, it seems, but servants, came on the Saturday, and, bringing sufficient testimonies that they were right, for one was the same who brought the five hundred guineas, I say, three of them came, and brought bottles of all sorts of wines, and hampers of sweetmeats to such a quantity, it appeared they designed to hold the trade on more than once, and that they would furnish everything to a profusion.

However, as I found a deficiency in two things, I made provision of about twelve dozen of fine damask napkins, with tablecloths of the same, sufficient to cover all the tables, with three tablecloths upon every table, and sideboards in proportion; also I bought a handsome quantity of plate, necessary to have served all the sideboards; but the gentlemen would not suffer any of it to be used, telling me they had bought fine china dishes and plates for the whole service, and that in such public places they could not be answerable for the plate; so it was set all up in a large glass cupboard, in the room I sat in, where it made a very good show indeed.

On Tuesday there came such an appearance of gentlemen and ladies, that my apartments were by no means able to receive them; and those who in particular appeared as principals, gave order below to let no more company come up. The street was full of coaches with coronets, and fine glass chairs; and, in short, it was impossible to receive the company. I kept my little room as before, and the dancers filled the great room; all the drawing-rooms also were filled, and three rooms below stairs, which were not mine.

It was very well that there was a strong party of the guards brought to keep the door, for without that there had been such a promiscuous crowd, and some of them scandalous too, that we should have been all disorder and confusion; but the three head servants managed all that, and had a word to admit all the company by.

It was uncertain to me, and is to this day, who it was that danced with me the Wednesday before, when the ball was my own; but that the k . . . was at this assembly was out of question with me, by circumstances that I suppose I could not be deceived in; and particularly, that there were five persons who were not masked; three of them had blue garters, and they appeared not to me till I came out to dance.

This meeting was managed just as the first, though with much more magnificence, because of the company. I placed myself (exceedingly rich in clothes and jewels) in the middle of my little room, as before, and made my compliment to all the company as they passed me, as I did before; but my Lord —, who had spoken openly to me the first night, came to me, and, unmasking, told me the company had ordered him to tell me they hoped they should see me in the dress I had appeared in the first day, which had been so acceptable that it had been the occasion of this new meeting; And, madam, says he, there are some in this assembly, who it is worth your while to oblige.

I bowed to my Lord —, and immediately withdrew. While I was above, a dressing in my new habit, two ladies, perfectly unknown to me, were conveyed into my apartment below, by the order of a noble person, who, with his family, had been in Persia; and here, indeed, I thought I should have been outdone, or perhaps balked.

One of these ladies was dressed most exquisitely fine indeed, in the habit of a virgin lady of quality of Georgia, and the other in the same habit of Armenia; with each of them a woman slave to attend them.

The ladies had their petticoats short to their ancles, but plaited all round, and before them short aprons, but of the finest point that could be seen ; their gowns were made with long antic sleeves hanging down behind, and a train let down ; they had no jewels, but their heads and breasts were dressed up with flowers, and they both came in veiled.

Their slaves were bareheaded, but their long, black hair was braided in locks hanging down behind to their waists, and tied up with ribands. They were dressed exceeding rich, and were as beautiful as their mistresses ; for none of them had any masks on. They waited in my room till I came down, and all paid their respects to me after the Persian manner, and sat down on a safra, that is to say, almost cross-legged, on a couch made up of cushions laid on the ground.

This was admirably fine, and I was indeed startled at it. They made their compliment to me in French, and I replied in the same language. When the doors were opened, they walked into the dancing-room, and danced such a dance as indeed nobody there had ever seen, and to an instrument like a guitar, with a small low-sounding trumpet, which indeed was very fine, and which my Lord — had provided.

They danced three times all alone, for nobody indeed could dance with them. The novelty pleased, truly, but yet there was something wild and bizarre in it, because they really acted to the life the barbarous country whence they came ; but as mine had the French behaviour under the Mahometan dress, it was every way as new, and pleased much better indeed.

As soon as they had shown their Georgian and Armenian shapes, and danced, as I have said, three times, they withdrew, paid their compliment to me (for I was queen of the day), and went off to undress.

Some gentlemen then danced with ladies all in masks ; and when they stopped, nobody rose up to dance, but all called out “Roxana, Roxana.” In the interval, my Lord — had brought another masked person into my room, who I knew not, only that I could discern it was not the same person that led me out before. This noble person (for I afterwards understood it was the Duke of —), after a short compliment, led me out into the middle of the room.

I was dressed in the same vest and girdle as before, but the robe had a mantle over it, which is usual in the Turkish habit, and it was of crimson and green, the green brocaded with gold; and my tyhiaai, or head-dress, varied a little from that I had before, as it stood higher, and had some jewels about the rising part, which made it look like a turban crowned.

I had no mask, neither did I paint, and yet I had the day of all the ladies that appeared at the ball; I mean of those that appeared with faces on. As for those masked, nothing could be said of them, no doubt there might be many finer than I was; it must be confessed that the habit was infinitely advantageous to me, and everybody looked at me with a kind of pleasure, which gave me great advantage too.

After I had danced with that noble person, I did not offer to dance by myself, as I had before; but they all called out "Roxana" again; and two of the gentlemen came into the drawing-room to entreat me to give them the Turkish dance, which I yielded to readily, so I came out and danced just as at first.

While I was dancing, I perceived five persons standing all together, and among them only one with his hat on. It was an immediate hint to me who it was, and had at first almost put me into some disorder; but I went on, received the applause of the house, as before, and retired into my own room. When I was there, the five gentlemen came across the room to my side, and, coming in, followed by a throng of great persons, the person with his hat on said, Madam Roxana, you perform to admiration. I was prepared, and offered to kneel to kiss his hand, but he declined it, and saluted me, and so, passing back again through the great room, went away.

I do not say here who this was, but I say I came afterwards to know something more plainly. I would have withdrawn, and disrobed, being somewhat too thin in that dress, unlaced and open-breasted, as if I had been in my shift; but it could not be, and I was obliged to dance afterwards with six or eight gentlemen, most, if not all of them, of the first rank; and I was told afterwards that one of them was the D—— of M——th.

About two or three o'clock in the morning the company began to decrease, the number of women especially, dropped away home, some and some at a time; and the gentlemen retired down stairs, where they unmasked and went to play.

Amy waited at the room where they played, sat up all night to attend them, and in the morning when they broke up they swept the box into her lap, when she counted out to me sixty-two guineas and a half; and the other servants got very well too. Amy came to me when they were all gone, Law, madam, says Amy, with a long gaping cry, what shall I do with all this money? And, indeed, the poor creature was half mad with joy.

I was now in my element. I was as much talked of as anybody could desire, and I did not doubt but something or other would come of it, but the report of my being so rich rather was a balk to my view than anything else; for the gentlemen that would, perhaps, have been troublesome enough otherwise, seemed to be kept off; for Roxana was too high for them.

There is a scene which came in here, which I must cover from human eyes or ears; for three years and about a month Roxana lived retired, having been obliged to make an excursion in a manner, and with a person which duty and private vows obliges her not to reveal, at least not yet.

At the end of this time I appeared again; but, I must add, that as I had in this time of retreat made hay, &c., so I did not come abroad again with the same lustre, or shine with so much advantage as before; for as some people had got at least a suspicion of where I had been, and who had had me all the while, it began to be public that Roxana was, in short, a mere Roxana, neither better nor worse, and not that woman of honour and virtue that was at first supposed.

You are now to suppose me about seven years come to town, and that I had not only suffered the old revenue, which I hinted was managed by Sir Robert Clayton, to grow, as was mentioned before, but I had laid up an incredible wealth, the time considered, and had I yet had the least thought of reforming, I had all the opportunity to do it with advantage that ever woman had; for the common vice of all whores, I mean money, was out of the question, nay even avarice itself seemed to be glutted; for, including what I had saved in reserving the interest of 14,000*l.*, which, as above, I had left to grow; and including some very good presents I had made to me in mere compliment, upon these shining masquerading meetings, which I held up for about two years, and what I made of three years of the most glorious retreat, as I call it, that ever woman had, I had fully doubled my first substance, and had near 5,000*l.* in money, which I kept at home, besides abundance of plate and jewels, which I had either given me, or had bought to set myself out for public days.

In a word, I had now five-and-thirty thousand pounds estate; and as I found ways to live without wasting either principal or interest, I laid up 2,000*l.* every year at least out of the mere interest, adding it to the principal, and thus I went on.

After the end of what I call my retreat, and out of which I brought a great deal of money, I appeared again, but I seemed like an old piece of plate that had been hoarded up some years, and comes out tarnished and discoloured; so I came out blown, and looked like a cast-off mistress; nor, indeed, was I any better, though I was not at all impaired in beauty, except that I was a little fatter than I was formerly, and always granting that I was four years older.

However, I preserved the youth of my temper, was always bright, pleasant in company, and agreeable to everybody, or else everybody flattered me; and in this condition I came abroad to the world again; and though I was not so popular as before, and, indeed, did not seek it, because I knew it could not be, yet I was far from being without company, and that of the greatest quality (of subjects I mean), who frequently visited me, and sometimes we had meetings for mirth and play at my apartments, where I failed not to divert them in the most agreeable manner possible.

Nor could any of them make the least particular application to me, from the notion they had of my excessive wealth, which, as they thought, placed me above the meanness of a maintenance, and so left no room to come easily about me.

But at last I was very handsomely attacked by a person of honour, and (which recommended him particularly to me) a person of a very great estate. He made a long introduction to me upon the subject of my wealth. Ignorant creature! said I to myself, considering him as a lord, was there ever woman in the world that could stoop to the baseness of being a whore, and was above taking the reward of her vice! No, no, depend upon it if your lordship obtains anything of me you must pay for it; and the notion of my being so rich, serves only to make it cost you the dearer, seeing you cannot offer a small matter to a woman of 2,000*l.* a year estate.

After he had harangued upon that subject a good while, and had assured me he had no design upon me, that he did not come to make a prize of me, or to pick my pocket, which, by the way, I was in no fear of, for I took too much care of my money to part with any of it that way; he then turned his discourse to the subject of love, a point so ridiculous to me without the main thing, I mean the money, that I had no patience to hear him make so long a story of it.

I received him civilly, and let him see I could bear to hear a wicked proposal without being affronted, and yet I was not to be brought into it too easily. He visited me a long while, and, in short, courted me as closely and assiduously as if he had been wooing me to matrimony. He made me several valuable presents, which I suffered myself to be prevailed with to accept, but not without great difficulty.

Gradually I suffered also his other importunities, and when he made a proposal of a compliment or appointment to me for a settlement, he said that though I was rich, yet there was not the less due from him to acknowledge the favours he received; and that if I was to be his, I should not live at my own expense, cost what it would. I told him I was far from being extravagant, and yet I did not live at the expense of less than 500*l.* a year out of my own pocket; that, however, I was not covetous of settled allowances, for I looked upon that as a kind of golden chain, something like matrimony, that though I knew how to be true to a man of honour, as I knew his lordship to be, yet I had a kind of aversion to the bonds; and though I was not so rich as the world talked me up to be, yet I was not so poor as to bind myself to hardships for a pension.

He told me he expected to make my life perfectly easy, and intended it so; that he knew of no bondage there could be in a private engagement between us; that the bonds of honour he knew I would be tied by, and think them no burthen, and for other obligations, he scorned to expect anything from me but what he knew, as a woman of honour, I could grant. Then as to maintenance, he told me he would soon show me that he valued me infinitely above 500*l.* a year; and upon this foot we began.

I seemed kinder to him after this discourse; and as time and private conversation made us very intimate, we began to come nearer to the main article, namely, the 500*l.* a year. He offered that at first word, and to acknowledge it as an infinite favour to have it be accepted of; and I, that thought it was too much by all the money, suffered myself to be mastered, or prevailed with to yield, ever on but a bare engagement upon parole.

When he had obtained his end that way, I told him my mind: Now you see, my lord, said I, how weakly I have acted, namely to yield to you without any capitulation, or anything secured to me but that which you may cease to allow when you please; if I am the less valued for such a confidence, I shall be injured in a manner that I will endeavour not to deserve.

He told me, that he would make it evident to me, that he did not seek me by way of bargain, as such things were often done; that as I had treated him with a generous confidence, so I should find I was in the hands of a man of honour, and one that knew how to value the obligation; and upon this he pulled out a goldsmith's bill for 300*l.*, which (putting it into my hand) he said he gave me as a pledge that I should not be a loser by my not having made a bargain with him.

This was engaging indeed, and gave me a good idea of our future correspondence; and, in short, as I could not refrain treating him with more kindness than I had done before, so one thing begetting another, I gave him several testimonies that I was entirely his own by inclination as well as by the common obligation of a mistress, and this pleased him exceedingly.

Soon after this private engagement, I began to consider whether it were not more suitable to the manner of life I now led, to be a little less public; and, as I told my lord, it would rid me of the importunities of others, and of continual visits from a sort of people who he knew of, and who, by the way, having now got the notion of me which I really deserved, began to talk of the old game, love and gallantry, and to offer at what was rude enough; things as nauseous to me now as if I had been married, and as virtuous as other people. The visits of these people began indeed to be uneasy to me, and particularly as they were always very tedious and impertinent; nor could my Lord — be pleased with them at all, if they had gone on. It would be diverting to set down here in what manner I repulsed these sort of people ; how in some I resented it as an affront, and told them that I was sorry they should oblige me to vindicate myself from the scandal of such suggestions, by telling them that I could see them no more, and by desiring them not to give themselves the trouble of visiting me, who, though I was not willing to be uncivil, yet thought myself obliged never to receive any visit from any gentleman after he had made such proposals as those to me. But these things would be too tedious to bring in here ; it was on this account I proposed to his lordship my taking new lodgings for privacy ; besides, I considered that as I might live very handsomely, and yet not so publicly, so I needed not spend so much money by a great deal ; and if I made 500*l.* a year of this generous person, it was more than I had any occasion to spend by a great deal.

My lord came readily into this proposal, and went farther than I expected, for he found out a lodging for me in a very handsome house, where yet he was not known ; I suppose he had employed somebody to find it out for him ; and where he had a convenient way to come into the garden, by a door that opened into the park, a thing very rarely allowed in those times.

By this key he could come in at what time of night or day he pleased ; and as we had also a little door in the lower part of the house, which was always left upon a lock, and his was the master-key, so if it was twelve, one, or two o'clock at night, he could come directly into my bedchamber. N.B.—I was not afraid I should be found a-bed with anybody else, for, in a word, I conversed with nobody at all.

It happened pleasantly enough one night, his lordship had stayed late, and I not expecting him that night, had taken Amy to bed with me, and when my lord came into the chamber we were both fast asleep. I think it was near three o'clock when he came in, and a little merry, but not at all fuddled, or what they call in drink ; and he came at once into the room.

Amy was frightened out of her wits, and cried out ; I said calmly, Indeed, my lord, I did not expect you to-night, and we have been a little frightened to-night with fire. O! says he, I see you have got a bedfellow with you. I began to make an apology : No, no, says my lord, you need no excuse, 'tis not a man bedfellow I see ; but then, talking merrily enough, he caught his words back, But, hark ye, says he, now I think on't, how shall I be satisfied it is not a man bedfellow ? O, says I, I dare say your lordship is satisfied 'tis poor Amy ; Yes, says he, 'tis Mrs. Amy, but how do I know what Amy is ? it may be Mr. Amy, for aught I know : I hope you'll give me leave to be satisfied. I told him, Yes, by all means, I would have his lordship satisfied, but I supposed he knew who she was.

Well, he fell foul of poor Amy, and indeed I thought once he would have carried the jest on before my face, as was once done in a like case : but his lordship was not so hot neither, but he would know whether Amy was Mr. Amy or Mrs. Amy, and so I suppose he did, and then being satisfied in that doubtful case, he walked to the farther end of the room, and went into a little closet and sat down.

In the mean time Amy and I got up, and I bid her run and make the bed in another chamber for my lord, and I gave her sheets to put into it ; which she did immediately, and I put my lord to bed there ; and when I had done, at his desire, went to bed to him. I was backward at first to come to bed to him, and made my excuse because I had been in bed with Amy, and had not shifted me, but he was past those niceties at that time ; and as long as he was sure it was Mrs. Amy and not Mr. Amy, he was very well satisfied, and so the jest passed over ; but Amy appeared no more all that night, or the next day, and when she did, my lord was so merry with her upon his eclaireissement, as he called it, that Amy did not know what to do with herself.

Not that Amy was such a nice lady in the main, if she had been fairly dealt with, as has appeared in the former part of this work ; but now she was surprised, and a little hurried, that she scarce knew where she was ; and besides, she was, as to his lordship, as nice a lady as any in the world, and for anything he knew of her, she appeared as such. The rest was to us only that knew of it.

I held this wicked scene of life out eight years, reckoning from my first coming to England ; and though my lord found no fault, yet I found without much examining, that any one who looked in my face might see I was above twenty years old, and yet, without flattering myself, I carried my age, which was above fifty, very well too.

I may venture to say that no woman ever lived a life like me, of six-and-twenty years of wickedness, without the least signals of remorse, without any signs of repentance, or without so much as a wish to put an end to it; I had so long habituated myself to a life of vice, that really it appeared to be no vice to me. I went on smooth and pleasant, I wallowed in wealth, and it flowed in upon me at such a rate, having taken the frugal measures that the good knight directed, so that I had at the end of the eight years two thousand eight hundred pounds coming yearly in, of which I did not spend one penny, being maintained by my allowance from my Lord —, and more than maintained by above 200*l.* per annum; for though he did not contract for 500*l.* a year, as I made dumb signs to have it be, yet he gave me money so often, and that in such large parcels, that I had seldom so little as seven to eight hundred pounds a year of him, one year with another.

I must go back here, after telling openly the wicked things I did, to mention something, which, however, had the face of doing good; I remembered that when I went from England, which was fifteen years before, I had left five little children, turned out as it were to the wide world, and to the charity of their father's relations; the eldest was not six years old, for we had not been married full seven years when their father went away.

After my coming to England, I was greatly desirous to hear how things stood with them; and whether they were all alive or not, and in what manner they had been maintained; and yet I resolved not to discover myself to them in the least, or to let any of the people that had the breeding of them up know that there was such a body left in the world as their mother.

Amy was the only body I could trust with such a commission, and I sent her into Spitalfields, to the old aunt and to the poor woman that were so instrumental in disposing the relations to take some care of the children, but they were both gone, dead and buried some years. The next inquiry she made was at the house where she carried the poor children, and turned them in at the door; when she came there she found the house inhabited by other people, so that she could make little or nothing of her inquiries, and came back with an answer that indeed was no answer to me, for it gave me no satisfaction at all. I sent her back to inquire in the neighbourhood, what was become of the family that lived in that house? and if they were removed, where they lived? and what circumstances they were in? and withal, if she could, what became of the poor children, and how they lived, and where? how they had been treated? and the like.

She brought me back word upon this second going, that she heard, as to the family, that the husband, who though but uncle-in-law to the children, had yet been kindest to them, was dead; and that the widow was left but in mean circumstances, that is to say, she did not want, but that she was not so well in the world as she was thought to be when her husband was alive.

That, as to the poor children, two of them, it seems, had been kept by her, that is to say, by her husband, while he lived, for that it was against her will, that we all knew; but the honest neighbours pitied the poor children, they said, heartily; for that their aunt used them barbarously, and made them little better than servants in the house to wait upon her and her children, and scarce allowed them clothes fit to wear.

These were, it seems, my eldest and third, which were daughters; the second was a son, the fourth a daughter, and the youngest a son.

To finish the melancholy part of this history of my two unhappy girls, she brought me word that as soon as they were able to go out and get any work they went from her, and some said she had turned them out of doors; but it seems she had not done so, but she used them so cruelly that they left her, and one of them went to service to a neighbour's a little way off, who knew her, an honest substantial weaver's wife, to whom she was chambermaid, and in a little time she took her sister out of the Bridewell of her aunt's house, and got her a place too.

This was all melancholy and dull. I sent her then to the weaver's house, where the eldest had lived, but found that, her mistress being dead, she was gone, and nobody knew there whither she went, only that they heard she had lived with a great lady at the other end of the town; but they did not know who that lady was.

These inquiries took us up three or four weeks, and I was not one jot the better for it, for I could hear nothing to my satisfaction. I sent her next to find out the honest man, who, as in the beginning of my story I observed, made them be entertained, and caused the youngest to be fetched from the town where we lived, and where the parish officers had taken care of him. This gentleman was still alive; and there she heard that my youngest daughter and eldest son was dead also; but that my youngest son was alive, and was at that time about seventeen years old, and that he was put out apprentice by the kindness and charity of his uncle, but to a mean trade, and at which he was obliged to work very hard.

Amy was so curious in this part that she went immediately to see him, and found him all dirty, and hard at work. She had no remembrance at all of the youth, for she had not seen him since he was about two years old; and it was evident he could have no knowledge of her.

However, she talked with him, and found him a good, sensible, mannerly youth; that he knew little of the story of his father or mother, and had no view of anything but to work hard for his living; and she did not think fit to put any great things into his head, lest it should take him off of his business, and perhaps make him turn giddy-headed, and be good for nothing; but she went and found out that kind man, his benefactor, who had put him out; and finding him a plain, well meaning, honest, and kind-hearted man, she opened her tale to him the easier. She made a long story, how she had a prodigious kindness for the child, because she had the same for his father and mother; told him that she was the servant-maid that brought all of them to their aunt's door, and run away and left them; that their poor mother wanted bread, and what came of her after she would have been glad to know. She added, that her circumstances had happened to mend in the world, and that, as she was in condition, so she was disposed to shew some kindness to the children if she could find them out.

He received her with all the civility that so kind a proposal demanded, gave her an account of what he had done for the child, how he had maintained him, fed and clothed him, put him to school, and at last put him out to a trade. She said he had indeed been a father to the child. But, sir, says she, 'tis a very laborious hard-working trade, and he is but a thin weak boy. That's true, says he; but the boy chose the trade, and I assure you I gave 20*l.* with him, and am to find him clothes all his apprenticeship ; and as to its being a hard trade, says he, that's the fate of his circumstances, poor boy ; I could not well do better for him.

Well, sir, as you did all for him in charity, says she, it was exceeding well ; but, as my resolution is to do something for him, I desire you will, if possible, take him away again from that place, where he works so hard, for I cannot bear to see the child work so very hard for his bread, and I will do something for him that shall make him live without such hard labour.

He smiled at that. I can, indeed, says he, take him away, but then I must lose my 20*l.* that I gave with him.

Well, sir, said Amy, I'll enable you to lose that 20*l.* immediately ; and so she put her hand in her pocket and pulls out her purse.

He begun to be a little amazed at her, and looked her hard in the face, and that so very much that she took notice of it, and said, Sir, I fancy by your looking at me you think you know me, but I am assured you do not, for I never saw your face before ; I think you have done enough for the child, and that you ought to be acknowledged as a father to him ; but you ought not to lose by your kindness to him, more than the kindness of bringing him up obliges you to ; and therefore there's the 20*l.*, added she, and pray let him be fetched away.

Well, madam, says he, I will thank you for the boy, as well as for myself ; but will you please to tell me what I must do with him ?

Sir, says Amy, as you have been so kind to keep him so many years, I beg you will take him home again one year more, and I'll bring you a hundred pounds more, which I will desire you to lay out in schooling and clothes for him, and to pay you for his board ; perhaps I may put him in a condition to return your kindness.

He looked pleased, but surprised very much, and inquired of Amy, but with very great respect, what he should go to school to learn, and what trade she would please to put him out to.

Amy said he should put him to learn a little Latin, and then merchants' accounts, and to write a good hand, for she would have him be put to a Turkey merchant.

Madam, says he, I am glad for his sake to hear you talk so; but do you know that a Turkey merchant will not take him under 400*l.* or 500*l.*?

Yes, sir, says Amy, I know it very well.

And, says he, that it will require as many thousands to set him up?

Yes, sir, says Amy, I know that very well too; and, resolving to talk very big, she added, I have no children of my own, and I resolve to make him my heir; and if 10,000*l.* be required to set him up, he shall not want it. I was but his mother's servant when he was born, and I mourned heartily for the disaster of the family; and I always said, if ever I was worth anything in the world, I would take the child for my own; and I'll be as good as my word now, though I did not then foresee that it would be with me as it has been since. And so Amy told him a long story how she was troubled for me, and what she would give to hear whether I was dead or alive, and what circumstances I was in; that if she could but find me, if I was ever so poor, she would take care of me, and make a gentlewoman of me again.

He told her that, as to the child's mother, she had been reduced to the last extremity, and was obliged (as he supposed she knew) to send the children all among her husband's friend; and if it had not been for him, they had all been sent to the parish; but that he obliged the other relations to share the charge among them; that he had taken two, whereof he had lost the eldest, who died of the small-pox; but that he had been as careful of this as of his own, and had made very little difference in their breeding up, only that when he came to put him out he thought it was best for the boy to put him to a trade which he might set up in without a stock, for otherwise his time would be lost; and that as to his mother, he had never been able to hear one word of her, no, not though he had made the utmost inquiry after her; that there went a report that she had drowned herself; but that he could never meet with anybody that could give him a certain account of it.

Amy counterfeited a cry for her poor mistress: told him, she would give anything in the world to see her, if she was alive; and a great deal more such-like talk they had about that; then they returned to speak of the boy.

He inquired of her, why she did not seek after the child before, that he might have been brought up from a younger age, suitable to what she designed to do for him.

She told him, she had been out of England, and was but newly returned from the East Indies. That she had been out of England, and was but newly returned, was true, but the latter was false, and was put in to blind him, and provide against farther inquiries; for it was not a strange thing for young women to go away poor to the East Indies, and come home vastly rich; so she went on with directions about him, and both agreed in this, that the boy should by no means be told what was intended for him, but only that he should be taken home again to his uncle's, that his uncle thought the trade too hard for him, and the like.

About three days after this, Amy goes again, and carried him the hundred pounds she promised him, but then Amy made quite another figure than she did before; for she went in my coach, with two footmen after her, and dressed very fine also, with jewels, and a gold watch; and there was indeed no great difficulty to make Amy look like a lady, for she was a very handsome well-shaped woman, and genteel enough; the coachman and servants were particularly ordered to show her the same respect as they would to me, and to call her Madam Collins, if they were asked any questions about her.

When the gentleman saw what a figure she made, it added to the former surprise, and he entertained her in the most respectful manner possible; congratulated her advancement in fortune, and particularly rejoiced that it should fall to the poor child's lot to be so provided for, contrary to all expectation.

Well, Amy talked big, but very free and familiar; told them she had no pride in her good fortune (and that was true enough, for to give Amy her due, she was far from it, and was as good-humoured a creature as ever lived); that she was the same as ever, and that she always loved this boy, and was resolved to do something extraordinary for him.

Then she pulled out her money, and paid him down a hundred and twenty pounds, which, she said, she paid him that he might be sure he should be no loser by taking him home again, and that she would come and see him again, and talk farther about things with him, that so all might be settled for him, in such a manner as accidents, such as mortality, or anything else, should make no alteration to the child's prejudice.

At this meeting, the uncle brought his wife out, a good motherly, comely, grave woman, who spoke very tenderly of the youth, and as it appeared, had been very good to him, though she had several children of her own. After a long discourse, she put in a word of her own. Madam, says she, I am heartily glad of the good intentions you have for this poor orphan, and I rejoice sincerely in it for his sake; but madam, you know (I suppose), that there are two sisters alive too: may we not speak a word for them? poor girls, says she, they have not been so kindly used as he has, and are turned out to the wide world.

Where are they, madam? says Amy.

Poor creatures, says the gentlewoman, they are out at service; nobody knows where but themselves; their case is very hard.

Well, madam, says Amy, though if I could find them, I would assist them, yet my concern is for my boy, as I call him, and I will put him into a condition to take care of his sisters.

But, madam, says the good compassionate creature, he may not be so charitable, perhaps, by his own inclination, for brothers are not fathers; and they have been cruelly used already, poor girls; we have often relieved them, both with victuals and clothes too, even while they were pretended to be kept by their barbarous aunt.

Well, madam, says Amy, what can I do for them; they are gone, it seems, and cannot be heard of? When I see them, 'tis time enough.

She pressed Amy then to oblige their brother, out of the plentiful fortune he was like to have, to do something for his sisters when he should be able.

Amy spoke coldly of that still, but said she would consider of it; and so they parted for that time; they had several meetings after this, for Amy went to see her adopted son, and ordered his schooling, clothes, and other things, but enjoined them not to tell the young man anything, but that they thought the trade he was at too hard for him, and they would keep him at home a little longer, and give him some schooling, to fit him for other business; and Amy appeared to him as she did before, only as one that had known his mother, and had some kindness for him.

Thus this matter passed on for near a twelvemonth, when it happened that one of my maid-servants having asked Amy leave (for Amy was mistress of the servants, and took and put out such as she pleased), I say, having asked leave to go into the city to see her friends, came home crying bitterly, and in a most grievous agony she was, and continued so several days, till Amy, perceiving the excess, and that the maid would certainly cry herself sick, she took an opportunity with her, and examined her about it.

The maid told her a long story that she had been to see her brother, the only brother she had in the world, and that she knew he was put out apprentice to a —; but there had come a lady in a coach to his Uncle —, who had brought him up, and made him take him home again; and so the wench run on with the whole story just as 'tis told above, till she came to that part that belonged to herself; And there, says she, I had not let them know where I lived, and the lady would have taken me, and they say, would have provided for me too, as she has done for my brother, but nobody could tell where to find me, and so I have lost it all, and all the hopes of being anything but a poor servant all my days; and then the girl fell a crying again.

Amy said, What's all this story? who could this lady be? it must be some trick sure? No, she said, it was not a trick, for she had made them take her brother home from apprentice, and bought him new clothes, and put him to have more learning; and the gentlewoman said she would make him her heir.

Her heir, says Amy, what does that amount to? it may be she had nothing to leave him; she might make anybody her heir.

No, no, says the girl, she came in a fine coach and horses, and I don't know how many footmen to attend her, and brought a great bag of gold, and gave it to my Uncle —, he that brought up my brother, to buy him clothes, and to pay for his schooling and board.

He that brought up your brother? says Amy; why did not he bring you up too, as well as your brother? Pray who brought you up then?

Here the poor girl told a melancholy story, how an aunt had brought up her and her sister, and how barbarously she had used them, as we have heard.

By this time Amy had her head full enough, and her heart too; and did not know how to hold it, or what to do, for she was satisfied that this was no other than my own daughter; for she told her all the history of her father and mother, and how she was carried by their maid to her aunt's door, just as is related in the beginning of my story.

Amy did not tell me this story for a great while, nor did she well know what course to take in it; but as she had authority to manage everything in the family, she took occasion some time after, without letting me know anything of it, to find some fault with the maid, and turn her away.

Her reasons were good, though at first I was not pleased when I heard of it, but I was convinced afterwards that she was in the right; for if she had told me of it, I should have been in great perplexity between the difficulty of concealing myself from my own child, and the inconvenience of having my way of living be known among my first husband's relations, and even to my husband himself; for as to his being dead at Paris, Amy seeing me resolved against marrying any more, had told me that she had formed that story only to make me easy when I was in Holland, if anything should offer to my liking.

However, I was too tender a mother still, notwithstanding what I had done, to let this poor girl go about the world drudging, as it were, for bread, and slaving at the fire, and in the kitchen, as a cook-maid; besides, it came into my head that she might perhaps marry some poor devil of a footman, or a coachman, or some such thing, and be undone that way, or, which was worse, be drawn in to lie with some of that coarse cursed kind, and be with child, and be utterly ruined that way; and in the midst of all my prosperity this gave me great uneasiness.

As to sending Amy to her, there was no doing that now; for as she had been servant in the house, she knew Amy as well as Amy knew me; and no doubt, though I was much out of her sight, yet she might have had the curiosity to have peeped at me, and seen me enough to know me again, if I had discovered myself to her; so that, in short, there was nothing to be done that way.

However, Amy, a diligent indefatigable creature, found out another woman, and gave her her errand, and sent her to the honest man's house in Spitalfields, whither she supposed the girl would go, after she was out of her place; and bade her talk with her, and tell her at a distance that as something had been done for her brother, so something would be done for her too; and that she should not be discouraged, she carried her 20*l.* to buy her clothes, and bid her not go to service any more, but think of other things; that she should take a lodging in some good family, and that she should soon hear farther.

The girl was overjoyed with this news, you may be sure, and at first a little too much elevated with it, and dressed herself very handsomely indeed, and as soon as she had done so, came and paid a visit to Madame Amy, to let her see how fine she was. Amy congratulated her, and wished it might be all as she expected; but admonished her not to be elevated with it too much; told her, humility was the best ornament of a gentlewoman; and a great deal of good advice she gave her, but discovered nothing.

All this was acted in the first years of my setting up my new figure here in town, and while the masks and balls were in agitation; and Amy carried on the affair of setting out my son into the world, which we were assisted in by the sage advice of my faithful counsellor, Sir Robert Clayton, who procured us a master for him, by whom he was afterwards sent abroad to Italy, as you shall hear in its place; and Amy managed my daughter too very well, though by a third hand.

My amour with my Lord — began now to draw to an end, and indeed, notwithstanding his money, it had lasted so long, that I was much more sick of his lordship, than he could be of me; he grew old and fretful, and captious, and I must add, which made the vice itself begin to grow surfeiting and nauseous to me, he grew worse and wickeder, the older he grew, and that to such degree as is not fit to write of, and made me so weary of him, that upon one of his capricious humours, which he often took occasion to trouble me with, I took occasion to be much less complaisant to him than I used to be; and as I knew him to be hasty, I first took care to put him into a little passion, and then to resent it, and this brought us to words, in which I told him I thought he grew sick of me; and he answered in a heat, that truly so he was. I answered, that I found his lordship was endeavouring to make me sick too; that I had met with several such rubs from him of late, and that he did not use me as he used to do, and I begged his lordship he would make himself easy. This I spoke with an air of coldness and indifference, such as I knew he could not bear; but I did not downright quarrel with him, and tell him I was sick of him too, and desire him to quit me, for I knew that would come of itself; besides, I had received a great deal of handsome usage from him, and I was loath to have the breach be on my side, that he might not be able to say I was ungrateful.

But he put the occasion into my hands, for he came no more to me for two months; indeed I expected a fit of absence, for such I had had several times before, but not for above a fortnight or three weeks at most: but after I had stayed a month, which was longer than ever he kept away yet, I took a new method with him, for I was resolved now it should be in my power to continue or not, as I thought fit. At the end of a month, therefore, I removed, and took lodgings at Kensington Gravel Pits, and that part next to the road to Acton, and left nobody in my lodgings but Amy and a footman, with proper instructions how to behave, when his lordship, being come to himself, should think fit to come again, which I knew he would.

About the end of two months, he came in the dusk of the evening as usual; the footman answered him, and told him his lady was not at home, but there was Mrs. Amy above; so he did not order her to be called down, but went up stairs into the dining-room, and Mrs. Amy came to him; he asked where I was? My lord, said she, my mistress has been removed a good while from hence, and lives at Kensington. Ay, Mrs. Amy, how come you to be here then? My lord, said she, we are here till the quarter-day, because the goods are not removed, and to give answers, if any comes to ask for my lady. Well, and what answer are you to give to me? Indeed, my lord, says Amy, I have no particular answer to your lordship, but to tell you, and everybody else, where my lady lives, that they may not think she's run away. No, Mrs. Amy, says he, I don't think she's run away, but indeed, I can't go after her so far as that. Amy said nothing to that, but made a courtesy, and said, she believed I would be there again for a week or two in a little time. How little time, Mrs. Amy? says my lord. She comes next Tuesday, says Amy. Very well, says my lord, I'll call and see her then; and so he went away.

Accordingly, I came on the Tuesday, and stayed a fortnight, but he came not; so I went back to Kensington, and after that I had very few of his lordship's visits, which I was very glad of, and in a little time after was more glad of it than I was at first, and upon a far better account too.

For now I began not to be sick of his lordship only, but really I began to be sick of the vice; and as I had good leisure now to divert and enjoy myself in the world as much as it was possible for any woman to do that ever lived in it, so I found that my judgment began to prevail upon me to fix my delight upon nobler objects than I had formerly done, and the very beginning of this brought some just reflections upon me relating to things past, and to the former manner of my living; and though there was not the least hint in all this from what may be called religion or conscience, and far from anything of repentance, or anything that was akin to it, especially at first; yet the sense of things, and the knowledge I had of the world, and the vast variety of scenes that I had acted my part in, began to work upon my senses, and it came so very strong upon my mind one morning when I had been lying awake some time in my bed, as if somebody had asked me the question, What was I a whore for now? It occurred naturally upon this inquiry, that at first I yielded to the importunity of my circumstances, the misery of which the devil dismally aggravated, to draw me to comply; for I confess I had strong natural aversions to the crime at first, partly owing to a virtuous education, and partly to a sense of religion; but the devil, and that greater devil of poverty, prevailed; and the person who laid siege to me, did it in such an obliging, and I may almost say, irresistible manner, all still managed by the evil spirit; for I must be allowed to believe that he has a share in all such things, if not the whole management of them. But, I say, it was carried on by that person in such an irresistible manner, that, as I said, when I related the fact, there was no withstanding it: these circumstances, I say, the devil managed not only to bring me to comply, but he continued them as arguments to fortify my mind against all reflection, and to keep me in that horrid course I had engaged in, as if it were honest and lawful.

But not to dwell upon that now; this was a pretence, and here was something to be said, though I acknowledge it ought not to have been sufficient to me at all; but, I say, to leave that, all this was out of doors; the devil himself could not form one argument, or put one reason into my head now, that could serve for an answer; no, not so much as a pretended answer to this question, Why I should be a whore now?

It had for a while been a little kind of excuse to me, that I was engaged with this wicked old lord, and that I could not in honour forsake him; but how foolish and absurd did it look to repeat the word 'honour' on so vile an occasion! as if a woman should prostitute her honour in point of honour; horrid inconsistency! Honour called upon me to detest the crime and the man too, and to have resisted all the attacks which, from the beginning, had been made upon my virtue; and honour, had it been consulted, would have preserved me honest from the beginning:

“For ‘honesty’ and ‘honour’ are the same.”

This, however, shows us with what faint excuses, and with what trifles, we pretend to satisfy ourselves, and suppress the attempts of conscience, in the pursuit of agreeable crime, and in the possessing those pleasures which we are loath to part with.

But this objection would now serve no longer, for my lord had, in some sort, broke his engagements (I won't call it honour again) with me, and had so far slighted me, as fairly to justify my entire quitting of him now; and so, as the objection was fully answered, the question remained still unanswered, Why am I a whore now? Nor indeed had I anything to say for myself, even to myself; I could not without blushing, as wicked as I was, answer, that I loved it for the sake of the vice, and that I delighted in being a whore, as such; I say, I could not say this, even to myself, and all alone, nor indeed would it have been true. I was never able, in justice and with truth, to say I was so wicked as that; but as necessity first debauched me, and poverty made me a whore at the beginning, so excess of avarice for getting money, and excess of vanity, continued me in the crime, not being able to resist the flatteries of great persons; being called the finest woman in France; being caressed by a prince; and afterwards, I had pride enough to expect, and folly enough to believe, though indeed without ground, by a great monarch. These were my baits, these the chains by which the devil held me bound, and by which I was indeed too fast held for any reasoning that I was then mistress of to deliver me from.

But this was all over now; avarice could have no pretence; I was out of the reach of all that fate could be supposed to do to reduce me; now I was so far from poor, or the danger of it, that I had 50,000*l.* in my pocket, at least; nay, I had the income of 50,000*l.*, for I had 2,500*l.* a year coming in upon very good land security, besides three or four thousand pounds in money, which I kept by me for ordinary occasions, and, besides, jewels, and plate, and goods, which were worth near 5,600*l.* more; these put together, when I ruminated on it all in my thoughts, as you may be sure I did often, added weight still to the question, as above, and it sounded continually in my head, What's next? What am I a whore for now?

It is true, this was, as I say, seldom out of my thoughts, but yet it made no impressions upon me of that kind which might be expected from a reflection of so important a nature, and which had so much of substance and seriousness in it.

But, however, it was not without some little consequences, even at that time, and which gave a little turn to my way of living at first, as you shall hear in its place.

But one particular thing intervened besides this, which gave me some uneasiness at this time, and made way for other things that followed. I have mentioned, in several little digressions, the concern I had upon me for my children, and in what manner I had directed that affair; I must go on a little with that part, in order to bring the subsequent parts of my story together.

My boy, the only son I had left that I had a legal right to call 'son,' was, as I have said, rescued from the unhappy circumstances of being apprentice to a mechanic, and was brought up upon a new foot; but though this was infinitely 'o his advantage, yet it put him back near three years in his coming into the world; for he had been near a year at the drudgery he was first put to, and it took up two years more to form him for what he had hopes given him he should hereafter be, so that he was full nineteen years old, or rather twenty years, before he came to be put out as I intended; at the end of which time I put him to a very flourishing Italian merchant, and he again sent him to Messina, in the island of Sicily; and a little before the juncture I am now speaking of, I had letters from him, that is to say, Mrs. Amy had letters from him, intimating that he was out of his time, and that he had an opportunity to be taken into an English house there, on very good terms, if his support from hence might answer what he was bid to hope for; and so begged that what would be done for him might be so ordered that he might have it for his present advancement, referring for the particulars to his master, the merchant in London, who he had been put apprentice to here; who, to cut the story short, gave such a satisfactory account of it, and of my young man, to my steady and faithful counsellor, Sir Robert Clayton, that I made no scruple to pay 4,000*l.*, which was 1,000*l.* more than he demanded, or rather proposed, that he might have encouragement to enter into the world better than he expected.

His master remitted the money very faithfully to him; and finding, by Sir Robert Clayton, that the young gentleman, for so he called him, was well supported, wrote such letters on his account, as gave him a credit at Messina equal in value to the money itself.

I could not digest it very well that I should all this while conceal myself thus from my own child, and make all this favour due, in his opinion, to a stranger; and yet I could not find in my heart to let my son know what a mother he had, and what a life she lived; when, at the same time that he must think himself infinitely obliged to me, he must be obliged, if he was a man of virtue, to hate his mother, and abhor the way of living by which all the bounty he enjoyed was raised.

This is the reason of mentioning this part of my son's story, which is otherwise no ways concerned in my history, but as it put me upon thinking how to put an end to that wicked course I was in, that my own child, when he should afterwards come to England in a good figure, and with the appearance of a merchant, should not be ashamed to own me.

But there was another difficulty, which lay heavier upon me a great deal, and that was, my daughter ; who, as before, I had relieved by the hands of another instrument, which Amy had procured. The girl, as I have mentioned, was directed to put herself into a good garb, take lodgings, and entertain a maid to wait upon her, and to give herself some breeding, that is to say, to learn to dance, and fit herself to appear as a gentlewoman ; being made to hope, that she should, some time or other, find that she should be put into a condition to support her character, and to make herself amends for all her former troubles ; she was only charged not to be drawn into matrimony, till she was secured of a fortune that might assist to dispose of herself suitable not to what she then was, but what she was to be.

The girl was too sensible of her circumstances not to give all possible satisfaction of that kind, and indeed she was mistress of too much understanding not to see how much she should be obliged to that part for her own interest.

It was not long after this, but being well equipped, and in everything well set out, as she was directed, she came, as I have related above, and paid a visit to Mrs. Amy, and to tell her of her good fortune. Amy pretended to be much surprised at the alteration, and overjoyed for her sake, and began to treat her very well, entertained her handsomely, and when she would have gone away, pretended to ask my leave, and sent my coach home with her ; and, in short, learning from her where she lodged, which was in the city, Amy promised to return her visit, and did so ; and in a word, Amy and Susan (for she was my own name) began an intimate acquaintance together.

There was an inexpressible difficulty in the poor girl's way, or else I should not have been able to have forborne discovering myself to her, and this was, her having been a servant in my particular family ; and I could by no means think of ever letting the children know what a kind of creature they owed their being to, or giving them an occasion to upbraid their mother with her scandalous life, much less to justify the like practice from my example.

Thus it was with me ; and thus, no doubt, considering parents always find it that their own children are a restraint to them in their worst courses, when the sense of a superior power has not the same influence. But of that hereafter.

There happened, however, one good circumstance in the case of this poor girl, which brought about a discovery sooner than otherwise it would have been, and it was thus : after she and Amy had been intimate for some time, and had exchanged several visits, the girl, now grown a woman, talking to Amy of the gay things that used to fall out when she was servant in my family, spoke of it with a kind of concern, that she could not see (me) her lady ; and at last she adds, 'Twas very strange, madam, says she to Amy, but though I lived near two years in the house, I never saw my mistress in my life, except it was that public night when she danced in the fine Turkish habit, and then she was so disguised that I knew nothing of her afterwards.

Amy was glad to hear this ; but as she was a cunning girl from the beginning, she was not to be bit, and so she laid no stress upon that at first, but gave me an account of it ; and I must confess it gave me a secret joy to think that I was not known to her ; and that, by virtue of that only accident, I might, when other circumstances made room for it, discover myself to her, and let her know she had a mother in a condition fit to be owned.

It was a dreadful restraint to me before, and this gave me some very sad reflections, and made way for the great question I have mentioned above ; and by how much the circumstance was bitter to me, by so much the more agreeable it was to understand that the girl had never seen me, and consequently, did not know me again if she was to be told who I was.

However, the next time she came to visit Amy, I was resolved to put it to a trial, and to come into the room and let her see me, and to see by that, whether she knew me or no ; but Amy put me by, lest indeed, as there was reason enough to question, I should not be able to contain, or forbear discovering myself to her ; so it went off for that time.

But both these circumstances, and that is the reason of mentioning them, brought me to consider of the life I lived, and to resolve to put myself into some figure of life in which I might not be scandalous to my own family, and be afraid to make myself known to my own children, who were my own flesh and blood.

There was another daughter I had, which, with all our inquiries, we could not hear of, high nor low, for several years after the first. But I return to my own story.

Being now in part removed from my old station, I seemed to be in a fair way of retiring from my old acquaintances, and consequently from the vile abominable trade I had driven so long ; so that the door seemed to be, as it were, particularly opened to my reformation, if I had any mind to it in earnest ; but, for all that, some of my old friends, as I had used to call them, inquired me out, and came to visit me at Kensington, and that more frequently than I wished they would do ; but it being once known where I was, there was no avoiding it, unless I would have downright refused and affronted them ; and I was not yet in earnest enough with my resolutions to go that length.

The best of it was, my old lewd favourite, who I now heartily hated, entirely dropped me ; he came once to visit me, but I caused Amy to deny me, and say I was gone out ; she did it so oddly too, that when his lordship went away, he said coldly to her, Well, well, Mrs. Amy, I find your mistress does not desire to be seen ; tell her I won't trouble her any more, repeating the words 'any more' two or three times over, just at his going away.

I reflected a little on it at first, as unkind to him, having had so many considerable presents from him, but, as I have said, I was sick of him, and that on some accounts, which if I could suffer myself to publish them, would fully justify my conduct ; but that part of the story will not bear telling, so I must leave it, and proceed.

I had begun a little, as I have said above, to reflect upon my manner of living, and to think of putting a new face upon it ; and nothing moved me to it more than the consideration of my having three children, who were now grown up ; and yet, that while I was in that station of life, I could not converse with them, or make myself known to them ; and this gave me a great deal of uneasiness ; at last I entered into talk on this part of it with my woman Amy.

We lived at Kensington, as I have said ; and though I had done with my old wicked l——, as above, yet I was frequently visited, as I said, by some others, so that, in a word, I began to be known in the town, not by name only, but by my character too, which was worse.

It was one morning when Amy was in bed with me, and I had some of my dullest thoughts about me, that Amy hearing me sigh pretty often, asked me if I was not well ? Yes, Amy,

I am well enough, says I, but my mind is oppressed with heavy thoughts, and has been so a good while; and then I told her how it grieved me that I could not make myself known to my own children, or form any acquaintances in the world. Why so? says Amy. Why, prithee Amy, says I, what will my children say to themselves, and to one another, when they find their mother, however rich she may be, is at best but a whore, a common whore? And as for acquaintance, prithee Amy, what sober lady, or what family of any character, will visit or be acquainted with a whore?

Why, all that's true, madam, says Amy; but how can it be remedied now? 'Tis true Amy, said I, the thing cannot be remedied now, but the scandal of it, I fancy, may be thrown off.

Truly, says Amy, I do not see how, unless you will go abroad again, and live in some other nation, where nobody has known us, or seen us, so that they cannot say they ever saw us before.

That very thought of Amy put what follows into my head; and I returned, Why, Amy, says I, is it not possible for me to shift my being, from this part of the town, and go and live in another part of the city, or another part of the country, and be as entirely concealed as if I had never been known?

Yes, says Amy, I believe it might; but then you must put off all your equipages and servants, coaches and horses; change your liveries, nay, your own clothes, and, if it was possible, your very face.

Well, says I, and that's the way, Amy, and that I'll do, and that forthwith; for I am not able to live in this manner any longer. Amy came into this with a kind of pleasure particular to herself, that is to say, with an eagerness not to be resisted; for Amy was apt to be precipitant in her motions, and was for doing it immediately. - Well, says I, Amy, as soon as you will, but what course must we take to do it? we cannot put off servants, and coach and horses, and everything, leave off housekeeping, and transform ourselves into a new shape all in a moment; servants must have warning, and the goods must be sold off, and a thousand things; and this began to perplex us, and in particular took us up two or three days' consideration.

At last, Amy, who was a clever manager in such cases, came to me with a scheme, as she called it. I have found it out, madam, says she; I have found a scheme how you shall, if you have a mind to it, begin and finish a perfect entire change of your figure and circumstances in one day, and shall be as much unknown, madam, in twenty-four hours, as you would be in so many years.

Come, Amy, says I, let us hear of it, for you please me mightily with the thoughts of it. Why, then, says Amy, let me go into the city this afternoon, and I'll inquire out some honest, plain, sober family, where I will take lodgings for you, as for a country-gentlewoman that desires to be in London for about half a year, and to board yourself and a kinswoman, that is, half a servant, half a companion, meaning myself; and so agree with them by the month.

To this lodging (if I hit upon one to your mind) you may go to-morrow morning in a hackney-coach, with nobody but me, and leave such clothes and linen as you think fit, but, to be sure, the plainest you have; and then you are removed at once, you never need so much as set your foot in this house again (meaning where we then were), or see anybody belonging to it; in the mean time I'll let the servants know that you are going over to Holland upon extraordinary business, and will leave off your equipages, and so I'll give them warning, or, if they will accept of it, give them a month's wages; then I'll sell off your furniture as well as I can; as to your coach, it is but having it new painted, and the lining changed, and getting new harness and hammercloths, and you may keep it still, or dispose of it as you think fit; and only take care to let this lodging be in some remote part of the town, and you may be as perfectly unknown as if you had never been in England in your life.

This was Amy's scheme, and it pleased me so well, that I resolved not only to let her go, but was resolved to go with her myself; but Amy put me off of that, because, she said, she should have occasion to hurry up and down so long, that if I was with her it would rather hinder than farther her; so I waived it.

In a word, Amy went, and was gone five long hours; but when she came back, I could see by her countenance that her success had been suitable to her pains, for she came laughing and gaping; O madam! says she, I have pleased you to the life; and with that, she tells me how she had fixed upon a house in a court in the Minories; that she was directed to it merely by accident; that it was a female family, the master of the house being gone to New England, and that the woman had four children, kept two maids, and lived very handsomely, but wanted company to divert her; and that on that very account she had agreed to take boarders.

Amy agreed for a good handsome price, because she was resolved I should be used well; so she bargained to give her 35*l.* for the half-year, and 50*l.* if we took a maid, leaving that to my choice; and that we might be satisfied we should meet with nothing very gay, the people were Quakers, and I liked them the better.

I was so pleased, that I resolved to go with Amy the next day to see the lodgings, and to see the woman of the house, and see how I liked them; but if I was pleased with the general, I was much more pleased with the particulars; for the gentlewoman, I must call her so, though she was a Quaker, was a most courteous, obliging, mannerly person; perfectly well-bred, and perfectly well-humoured, and, in short, the most agreeable conversation that ever I met with; and, which was worth all, so grave, and yet so pleasant and so merry, that 'tis scarce possible for me to express how I was pleased and delighted with her company; and particularly, I was so pleased that I would go away no more; so I e'en took up my lodging there the very first night.

In the mean time, though it took up Amy almost a month, so entirely to put off all the appearances of housekeeping, as above, it need take me up no time to relate it; 'tis enough to say, that Amy quitted all that part of the world, and came pack and package to me, and here we took up our abode.

I was now in a perfect retreat indeed; remote from the eyes of all that ever had seen me, and as much out of the way of being ever seen or heard of by any of the gang that used to follow me, as if I had been among the mountains in Lancashire; for when did a blue garter, or a coach-and-six, come into a little narrow passage in the Minories, or Goodman's Fields? And as there was no fear of them, so really I had no desire to see them, or so much as to hear from them any more as long as I lived.

I seemed in a little hurry while Amy came and went so every day at first; but when that was over, I lived here perfectly retired, and with a most pleasant and agreeable lady; I must call her so, for though a Quaker, she had a full share of good breeding, sufficient to her if she had been a duchess; in a word, she was the most agreeable creature in her conversation, as I said before, that ever I met with.

I pretended, after I had been there some time, to be extremely in love with the dress of the Quakers, and this pleased her so much, that she would needs dress me up one day in a suit of her own clothes; but my real design was, to see whether it would pass upon me for a disguise.

Amy was struck with the novelty, though I had not mentioned my design to her, and when the Quaker was gone out of the room, says Amy, I guess your meaning; it is a perfect disguise to you; why, you look quite another body, I should not have known you myself; nay, says Amy, more than that, it makes you look ten years younger than you did.

Nothing could please me better than that, and when Amy repeated it, I was so fond of it, that I asked my Quaker (I won't call her landlady, 'tis indeed too coarse a word for her, and she deserved a much better), I say, I asked her if she would sell it; I told her I was so fond of it, that I would give her enough to buy her a better suit; she declined it at first, but I soon perceived that it was chiefly in good manners, because I should not dishonour myself, as she called it, to put on her old clothes; but if I pleased to accept of them, she would give me them for my dressing-clothes, and go with me, and buy a suit for me, that might be better worth my wearing.

But as I conversed in a very frank open manner with her, I bid her do the like with me; that I made no scruples of such things, but that if she would let me have them, I would satisfy her; so she let me know what they cost, and to make her amends, I gave her three guineas more than they cost her.

This good (though unhappy) Quaker had the misfortune to have had a bad husband, and he was gone beyond sea; she had a good house, and well-furnished, and had some jointure of her own estate, which supported her and her children, so that she did not want; but she was not at all above such a help as my being there was to her; so she was as glad of me as I was of her.

However, as I knew there was no way to fix this new acquaintance like making myself a friend to her, I began with making her some handsome presents, and the like to her children. And first, opening my bundles one day in my chamber, I heard her in another room, and called her in with a kind of familiar way; there I showed her some of my fine clothes, and having among the rest of my things a piece of very fine new holland, which I had bought a little before, worth about 9s. an ell, I pulled it out, Here, my friend, says I, I will make you a present, if you will accept of it; and with that I laid the piece of holland in her lap.

I could see she was surprised, and that she could hardly speak. What dost thou mean? says she; indeed I cannot have the face to accept so fine a present as this; adding, 'tis fit for thy own use, but 'tis above my wear, indeed. I thought she had meant she must not wear it so fine, because she was a Quaker; so I returned, Why, do not you Quakers wear fine linen neither? Yes, says she, we wear fine linen when we can afford it, but this is too good for me. However, I made her take it, and she was very thankful too; but my end was answered another way, for by this I engaged her so, that as I found her a woman of understanding, and of honesty too, I might, upon any occasion, have a confidence in her, which was, indeed, what I very much wanted.

By accustoming myself to converse with her, I had not only learned to dress like a Quaker, but so used myself to 'thee' and 'thou,' that I talked like a Quaker too, as readily and naturally as if I had been born among them; and, in a word, I passed for a Quaker among all people that did not know me. I went but little abroad, but I had been so used to a coach, that I knew not how well to go without one; besides, I thought it would be a farther disguise to me, so I told my Quaker friend one day, that I thought I lived too close, that I wanted air; she proposed taking a hackney-coach sometimes, or a boat; but I told her I had always had a coach of my own till now, and I could find in my heart to have one again.

She seemed to think it strange at first, considering how close I lived, but had nothing to say when she found I did not value the expense; so, in short, I resolved I would have a coach. When we came to talk of equipages, she extolled the having all things plain. I said so too; so I left it to her direction, and a coach-maker was sent for, and he provided me a plain coach, no gilding or painting, lined with a light grey cloth, and my coachman had a coat of the same, and no lace on his hat.

When all was ready, I dressed myself in the dress I bought of her, and said, Come, I'll be a Quaker to-day, and you and I'll go abroad; which we did, and there was not a Quaker in the town looked less like a counterfeit than I did. But all this was my particular plot, to be the more completely concealed, and that I might depend upon being not known, and yet need not be confined like a prisoner, and be always in fear; so that all the rest was grimace.

We lived here very easy and quiet, and yet I cannot say I was so in my mind; I was like a fish out of water; I was as gay, and as young in my disposition, as I was at five-and-twenty; and as I had always been courted, flattered, and used to love it, so I missed it in my conversation; and this put me many times upon looking back upon things past.

I had very few moments in my life which, in their reflection, afforded me anything but regret; but of all the foolish actions I had to look back upon in my life, none looked so preposterous and so like distraction, nor left so much melancholy on my mind, as my parting with my friend, the merchant of Paris, and the refusing him upon such honourable and just conditions as he had offered; and though on his just (which I called unkind) rejecting my invitation to come to him again, I had looked on him with some disgust, yet now my mind run upon him continually, and the ridiculous conduct of my refusing him, and I could never be satisfied about him; I flattered myself that if I could but see him, I could yet master him, and that he would presently forget all that had passed that might be thought unkind; but as there was no room to imagine anything like that to be possible, I threw those thoughts off again as much as I could.

However, they continually returned, and I had no rest night or day for thinking of him, who I had forgot above eleven years. I told Amy of it, and we talked it over sometimes in bed, almost whole nights together. At last, Amy started a thing of her own head, which put it in a way of management, though a wild one too. You are so uneasy, madam, says she, about this Mr. ———, the merchant at Paris; come, says she, if you'll give me leave, I'll go over and see what's become of him.

Not for ten thousand pounds, said I; no, nor if you met him in the street, not to offer to speak to him on my account. No, says Amy, I would not speak to him at all, or if I did, I warrant you it shall not look to be upon your account; I'll only inquire after him, and if he is in being, you shall hear of him; if not you shall hear of him still, and that may be enough.

Why, says I, if you will promise me not to enter into anything relating to me with him, nor to begin any discourse at all, unless he begins it with you, I could almost be persuaded to let you go and try.

Amy promised me all that I desired; and, in a word, to cut the story short, I let her go; but tied her up to so many particulars, that it was almost impossible her going could signify anything; and had she intended to observe them, she might as well have stayed at home as have gone; for I charged her, if she came to see him, she should not so much as take notice that she knew him again; and if he spoke to her, she should tell him she was come away from me a great many years ago, and knew nothing what was become of me; that she had been come over to France six years ago, and was married there, and lived at Calais; or to that purpose.

Amy promised me nothing, indeed, for, as she said it was impossible for her to resolve what would be fit to do, or not to do, till she was there upon the spot, and had found out the gentleman, or heard of him; but that then, if I would trust her, as I had always done, she would answer for it that she would do nothing but what should be for my interest, and what she would hope I should be very well pleased with.

With this general commission, Amy, notwithstanding she had been so frightened at the sea, ventured her carcass once more by water, and away she goes to France; she had four articles of confidence in charge to inquire after for me, and, as I found by her, she had one for herself; I say, four for me, because, though her first and principal errand was to inform herself of my Dutch merchant, yet I gave her in charge to inquire, second, after my husband, who I left a trooper in the gens d'armes; third, after that rogue of a Jew, whose very name I hated, and of whose face I had such a frightful idea, that Satan himself could not counterfeit a worse; and, lastly, after my foreign prince. And she discharged herself very well of them all, though not so successful as I wished.

Amy had a very good passage over the sea, and I had a letter from her, from Calais, in three days after she went from London. When she came to Paris, she wrote me an account, that as to her first and most important inquiry, which was after the Dutch merchant, her account was, that he had returned to Paris, lived three years there, and, quitting that city, went to live at Rouen; so away goes Amy for Rouen.

But as she was going to bespeak a place in the coach to Rouen, she meets very accidentally in the street with her gentleman, as I called him; that is to say, the Prince do ——'s gentleman, who had been her favourite, as above.

You may be sure there were several other kind things happened between Amy and him, as you shall hear afterwards; but the two main things were, first, that Amy inquired about his lord, and had a full account of him, of which presently; and, in the next place, telling him whither she was going, and for what, he bade her not go yet, for that he would have a particular account of it the next day from a merchant that knew him; and accordingly he brought her word the next day, that he had been for six years before that gone for Holland, and that he lived there still.

This, I say, was the first news from Amy for some time, I mean about my merchant. In the mean time, Amy, as I have said, inquired about the other persons she had in her instructions. As for the prince, the gentleman told her he was gone into Germany, where his estate lay, and that he lived there; that he had made great inquiry after me; that he (his gentleman) had made all the search he had been able for me, but that he could not hear of me; that he believed, if his lord had known I had been in England, he would have gone over to me; but that, after long inquiry, he was obliged to give it over; but that he verily believed, if he could have found me, he would have married me; and that he was extremely concerned that he could hear nothing of me.

I was not at all satisfied with Amy's account, but ordered her to go to Rouen herself; which she did, and there with much difficulty (the person she was directed to being dead), I say, with much difficulty, she came to be informed that my merchant had lived there two years, or something more; but that having met with a very great misfortune, he had gone back to Holland, as the French merchant said, where he had stayed two years; but with this addition, viz., that he came back again to Rouen, and lived in good reputation there another year; and afterwards, he was gone to England, and that he lived in London. But Amy could by no means learn how to write to him there, till, by great accident, an old Dutch skipper, who had formerly served him, coming to Rouen, Amy was told of it; and he told her that he lodged in St. Laurence Pountney's-lane, in London, but was to be seen every day upon the Exchange in the French walk.

This, Amy thought, it was time enough to tell me of when she came over; and besides, she did not find this Dutch skipper till she had spent four or five months, and been again at Paris, and then come back to Rouen for farther information. But in the mean time she wrote to me from Paris, that he was not to be found by any means; that he had been gone from Paris seven or eight years; that she was told he had lived at Rouen, and she was a going thither to inquire, but that she had heard afterwards that he was gone also from thence to Holland, so she did not go.

This, I say, was Amy's first account; and I, not satisfied with it, had sent her an order to go to Rouen, to inquire there also, as above.

While this was negotiating, and I received these accounts from Amy at several times, a strange adventure happened to me, which I must mention just here; I had been abroad to take the air, as usual, with my Quaker, as far as Epping Forest, and we were driving back towards London, when on the road between Bow and Mile-End, two gentlemen on horseback came riding by, having overtaken the coach and passed it, and went forwards towards London.

They did not ride apace, though they passed the coach, for we went very softly, nor did they look into the coach at all, but rode side by side, earnestly talking to one another, and inclining their faces sideways a little towards one another, he that went nearest the coach, with his face from it, and he that was farthest from the coach, with his face towards it, and passing in the very next tract to the coach, I could hear them talk Dutch very distinctly; but it is impossible to describe the confusion I was in, when I plainly saw that the farthest of the two, him whose face looked towards the coach, was my friend, the Dutch merchant of Paris.

If it had been possible to conceal my disorder from my friend the Quaker, I would have done it, but I found she was too well acquainted with such things not to take the hint. Dost thou understand Dutch? said she. Why? said I. Why, says she, it is easy to suppose that thou art a little concerned at somewhat those men say; I suppose they are talking of thee. Indeed, my good friend, said I, thou art mistaken this time, for I know very well what they are talking of, but 'tis all about ships and trading affairs. Well, says she, then one of them is a man friend of thine, or somewhat is the case; for though thy tongue will not confess it, thy face does.

I was going to have told a bold lie, and said I knew nothing of them, but I found it was impossible to conceal it, so I said, Indeed, I think I know the farthest of them; but I have neither spoken to him, or so much as seen him, for above eleven years. Well, then, says she, thou hast seen him with more than common eyes when thou didst see him, or else seeing him now would not be such a surprise to thee. Indeed, said I, it is true I am a little surprised at seeing him just now, for I thought he had been in quite another part of the world; and I can assure you I never saw him in England in my life. Well, then, it is the more likely he is come over now on purpose to seek thee. No, no, said I, knight-errantry is over, women are not so hard to come at, that men should not be able to please themselves without running from one kingdom to another. Well, well, says she, I would have him see thee for all that, as plainly as thou hast seen him. No, but he sha'n't, says I, for I am sure he don't know me in this dress, and I'll take care he sha'n't see my face, if I can help it; so I held up my fan before my face, and she saw me resolute in that, so she pressed me no farther.

We had several discourses upon the subject, but still I let her know I was resolved he should not know me; but, at last, I confessed so much, that though I would not let him know who I was, or where I lived, I did not care if I knew where he lived, and how I might inquire about him. She took the hint immediately, and her servant being behind the coach, she called him to the coach side, and bade him keep his eye upon that gentleman, and as soon as the coach came to the end of Whitechapel, he should get down, and follow him closely, so as to see where he put up his horse, and then to go into the inn and inquire, if he could, who he was and where he lived.

The fellow followed diligently to the gate of an inn in Bishopsgate-street, and seeing him go in, made no doubt but he had him fast, but was confounded when, upon inquiry, he found the inn was a thoroughfare into another street, and that the two gentlemen had only rode through the inn, as the way to the street where they were going; and so, in short, came back no wiser than he went.

My kind Quaker was more vexed at the disappointment, at least apparently so, than I was; and asking the fellow if he was sure he knew the gentleman again if he saw him, the fellow said he had followed him so close, and took so much notice of him, in order to do his errand as it ought to be done, that he was very sure he should know him again; and that besides, he was sure he should know his horse.

This part was, indeed, likely enough; and the kind Quaker, without telling me anything of the matter, caused her man to place himself just at the corner of Whitechapel church wall every Saturday in the afternoon, that being the day when the citizens chiefly ride abroad to take the air; and there to watch all the afternoon and look for him.

It was not till the fifth Saturday that her man came, with a great deal of joy, and gave her an account that he had found out the gentleman; that he was a Dutchman, but a French merchant; that he came from Rouen, and his name was ———, and that he lodged at Mr. ——— on Laurence Pountney's hill. I was surprised, yon may be sure, when she came and told me one evening all the particulars, except that of having set her man to watch. I have found out thy Dutch friend, says she, and can tell thee how to find him too. I coloured again as red as fire. Then thou hast dealt with the evil one, friend, said I, very gravely. No, no, says she, I have no familiar; but I tell thee, I have found him for thee, and his name is so and so, and he lives as above recited.

I was surprised again at this, not being able to imagine how she should come to know all this. However, to put me out of pain, she told me what she had done. Well, said I, thou art very kind, but this is not worth thy pains; for now I know it, 'tis only to satisfy my curiosity, for I shall not send to him upon any account. Be that as thou wilt, says she ; besides, added she, thou art in the right to say so to me, for why should I be trusted with it? though if I were, I assure thee I should not betray thee. That's very kind, said I, and I believe thee ; and assure thyself, if I do send to him thou shalt know it, and be trusted with it too.

During this interval of five weeks, I suffered a hundred thousand perplexities of mind. I was thoroughly convinced I was right as to the person, that it was the man : I knew him so well, and saw him so plain, I could not be deceived. I drove out again in the coach (on pretence of air) almost every day, in hopes of seeing him again, but was never so lucky as to see him ; and now I had made the discovery, I was as far to seek what measures to take as I was before.

To send to him, or speak to him first, if I should see him, so as to be known to him, that I resolved not to do, if I died for it ; to watch him about his lodging, that was as much below my spirit as the other ; so that, in a word, I was at a perfect loss how to act, or what to do.

At length came Amy's letter, with the last account which she had at Rouen, from the Dutch skipper, which, confirming the other, left me out of doubt that this was my man ; but still, no human invention could bring me to the speech of him, in such a manner as would suit with my resolutions ; for, after all, how did I know what his circumstances were ? whether married or single ? and if he had a wife, I knew he was so honest a man, he would not so much as converse with me, or so much as know me if he met me in the street.

In the next place, as he had entirely neglected me, which, in short, is the worst way of slighting a woman, and had given no answer to my letters, I did not know but he might be the same man still ; so I resolved that I could do nothing in it, unless some fairer opportunity presented, which might make my way clearer to me ; for I was determined he should have no room to put any more slights upon me.

In these thoughts I passed away near three months ; till at last, being impatient, I resolved to send for Amy to come over, and tell her how things stood, and that I would do nothing till she came. Amy, in answer, sent me word she would come away with all speed, but begged of me that I would enter into no engagement with him, or anybody, till she arrived ; but still keeping me in the dark as to the thing itself which she had to say; at which I was heartily vexed, for many reasons.

But while all these things were transacting, and letters and answers passed between Amy and I a little slower than usual, at which I was not so well pleased as I used to be with Amy's despatch, I say, in this time the following scene opened.

It was one afternoon, about four o'clock, my friendly Quaker and I sitting in her chamber up stairs, and very cheerful, chatting together (for she was the best company in the world), when somebody ringing hastily at the door, and no servant just then in the way, she ran down herself to the door, when a gentleman appears, with a footman attending, and making some apologies, which she did not thoroughly understand, he speaking but broken English, he asked to speak with me, by the very same name that I went by in her house, which, by the way, was not the name that he had known me by.

She, with very civil language, in her way, brought him into a very handsome parlour below stairs, and said she would go and see whether the person who lodged in her house owned that name, and he should hear farther.

I was a little surprised, even before I knew anything of who it was, my mind foreboding the thing as it happened (whence that arises, let the naturalists explain to us); but I was frightened, and ready to die, when my Quaker came up all gay and crowing. There, says she, is the Dutch French merchant come to see thee. I could not speak one word to her, nor stir off of my chair, but sat as motionless as a statue. She talked a thousand pleasant things to me, but they made no impression on me; at last she pulled me and teased me, Come, come, says she, be thyself, and rouse up, I must go down again to him; what shall I say to him? Say, said I, that you have no such body in the house. That I cannot do, says she, because it is not the truth; besides, I have owned thou art above; come, come, go down with me. Not for a thousand guineas, said I. Well, says she, I'll go and tell him thou wilt come quickly. So, without giving me time to answer her, away she goes.

A million of thoughts circulated in my head while she was gone, and what to do I could not tell; I saw no remedy but I must speak with him, but would have given 500*l.* to have shunned it; yet had I shunned it, perhaps then I would have given 500*l.* again that I had seen him. Thus fluctuating and unconcluding were my thoughts, what I so earnestly desired I declined when it offered itself; and what now I pretended to decline, was nothing but what I had been at the expense of 40*l.* or 50*l.* to send Amy to France for; and even without any view, or, indeed, any rational expectation of bringing it to pass; and what for half a year before I was so uneasy about that I could not be quiet night or day, till Amy proposed to go over to inquire after him. In short, my thoughts were all confused, and in the utmost disorder. I had once refused and rejected him, and I repented it heartily; then I had taken ill his silence, and in my mind rejected him again, but had repented that too. Now I had stooped so low as to send after him into France, which if he had known, perhaps, he had never come after me; and should I reject him a third time! On the other hand, he had repented too, in his turn, perhaps, and not knowing how I had acted, either in stooping to send in search after him, or in the wickeder part of my life, was come over hither to seek me again; and I might take him, perhaps, with the same advantages as I might have done before, and would I now be backward to see him! Well, while I was in this hurry, my friend the Quaker comes up again, and perceiving the confusion I was in, she runs to her closet, and fetched me a little pleasant cordial; but I would not taste it. O, says she, I understand thee, be not uneasy, I'll give thee something shall take off all the smell of it; if he kisses thee a thousand times he shall be no wiser. I thought to myself, thou art perfectly acquainted with affairs of this nature, I think you must govern me now, so I began to incline to go down with her; upon that I took the cordial, and she gave me a kind of spicy preserve after it, whose flavour was so strong, and yet so deliciously pleasant, that it would cheat the nicest smelling, and it left not the least taint of the cordial on the breath.

Well, after this, though with some hesitation still, I went down a pair of back stairs with her, and into a dining-room, next to the parlour in which he was; but there I halted, and desired she would let me consider of it a little. Well, do so, says she; and left me with more readiness than she did before; Do consider, and I'll come to thee again.

Though I hung back with an awkwardness that was really unfeigned, yet when she so readily left me, I thought it was not so kind, and I began to think she should have pressed me still on to it; so foolishly backward are we to the thing which, of all the world, we most desire; mocking ourselves with a feigned reluctance, when the negative would be death to us; but she was too cunning for me, for while I, as it were, blamed her in my mind for not carrying me to him, though at the same time I appeared backward to see him, on a sudden she unlocks the folding-doors, which looked into the next parlour, and throwing them open, There, says she (ushering him in), is the person who I suppose thou inquirest for; and the same moment, with a kind decency, she retired, and that so swift, that she would not give us leave hardly to know which way she went.

I stood up, but was confounded with a sudden inquiry in my thoughts, how I should receive him? and with a resolution as swift as lightning, in answer to it, said to myself, it shall be coldly; so on a sudden I put on an air of stiffness and ceremony, and held it for about two minutes; but it was with great difficulty.

He restrained himself, too, on the other hand, came towards me gravely, and saluted me in form; but it was, it seems, upon his supposing the Quaker was behind him, whereas she, as I said, understood things too well, and had retired, as if she had vanished, that we might have full freedom; for, as she said afterwards, she supposed we had seen one another before, though it might have been a great while ago.

Whatever stiffness I had put on my behaviour to him, I was surprised in my mind, and angry at his, and began to wonder what kind of a ceremonious meeting it was to be. However, after he perceived the woman was gone, he made a kind of a hesitation, looking a little round him; Indeed, said he, I thought the gentlewoman was not withdrawn; and with that he took me in his arms, and kissed me three or four times; but I, that was prejudiced to the last degree with the coldness of his first salutes, when I did not know the cause of it, could not be thoroughly cleared of the prejudice, though I did know the cause; and thought that even his return, and taking me in his arms, did not seem to have the same ardour with which he used to receive me, and this made me behave to him awkwardly, and I know not how, for a good while; but this by the way.

He began with a kind of an ecstasy upon the subject of his finding me out ; how it was possible that he should have been four years in England, and had used all the ways imaginable, and could never so much as have the least intimation of me, or of any one like me ; and that it was now above two years that he had despaired of it, and had given over all inquiry ; and that now he should chop upon me, as it were, unlooked and unsought for.

I could easily have accounted for his not finding me, if I had but set down the detail of my real retirement ; but I gave it a new, and indeed a truly hypocritical turn. I told him that any one that knew the manner of life I led might account for his not finding me ; that the retreat I had taken up would have rendered it a hundred thousand to one odds that he ever found me at all ; that as I had abandoned all conversation, taken up another name, lived remote from London, and had not preserved one acquaintance in it, it was no wonder he had not met with me ; that even my dress would let him see that I did not desire to be known by anybody.

Then he asked if I had not received some letters from him ? I told him, No, he had not thought fit to give me the civility of an answer to the last I wrote to him ; and he could not suppose I should expect a return, after a silence in a case where I had laid myself so low, and exposed myself in a manner I had never been used to ; that, indeed, I had never sent for any letters after that to the place where I had ordered his to be directed ; and that, being so justly, as I thought, punished for my weakness, I had nothing to do but to repent of being a fool, after I had strictly adhered to a just principle before. That however, as what I did was rather from motions of gratitude than from real weakness, however it might be construed by him, I had the satisfaction in myself of having fully discharged the debt. I added, that I had not wanted occasions of all the seeming advancements which the pretended felicity of a marriage life was usually set off with, and might have been what I desired not to name ; but that, however low I had stooped to him, I had maintained the dignity of female liberty against all the attacks either of pride or avarice ; and that I had been infinitely obliged to him for giving me an opportunity to discharge the only obligation that endangered me, without subjecting me to the consequence; and that I hoped he was satisfied I had paid the debt, by offering myself to be chained, but was infinitely debtor to him another way for letting me remain free.

He was so confounded at this discourse, that he knew not what to say, and for a good while he stood mute indeed; but recovering himself a little, he said, I run out into a discourse he hoped was over and forgotten, and he did not intend to revive it; that he knew I had not had his letters, for that, when he first came to England, he had been at the place to which they were directed, and found them all lying there but one, and that the people had not known how to deliver them; that he thought to have had a direction there how to find me, but had the mortification to be told that they did not so much as know who I was; that he was under a great disappointment; and that I ought to know, in answer to all my resentments, that he had done a long and, he hoped, a sufficient penance for the slight that I had supposed he had put upon me; that it was true (and I could not suppose any other), that upon the repulse I had given him, in a case so circumstanced as his was, and after such earnest entreaties, and such offers as he had made me, he went away with a mind heartily grieved and full of resentment; that he had looked back on the crime he had committed with some regret, but on the cruelty of my treatment of the poor infant I went with at that time with the utmost detestation; and that this made him unable to send an agreeable answer to me; for which reason he had sent none at all for some time; but that in about six or seven months, those resentments wearing off by the return of his affection to me, and his concern in the poor child —: there he stopped, and indeed tears stood in his eyes, while, in a parenthesis, he only added, And to this minute he did not know whether it was dead or alive; he then went on—Those resentments wearing off, he sent me several letters, I think he said seven or eight, but received no answer; that then his business obliging him to go to Holland, he came to England, as in his way, but found, as above, that his letters had not been called for, but that he left them at the house, after paying the postage of them; and going then back to France, he was yet uneasy, and could not refrain the knight-errantry of coming to England again to seek me, though he knew neither where, or of who, to inquire for me, being disappointed in all his inquiries before; that he had yet taken up his residence here, firmly believing that, one time or other, he should meet me, or hear of me, and that some kind chance would at last throw him in my way; that he had lived thus above four years, and though his hopes were vanished, yet he had not any thoughts of removing any more in the world, unless it should be at last, as it is with other old men, he might have some inclination to go home to die in his own country, but that he had not thought of it yet; that if I would consider all these steps, I would find some reasons to forget his first resentments, and to think that penance, as he called it, which he had undergone in search of me, an amende honorable, in reparation of the affront given to the kindness of my letter of invitation; and that we might at last make ourselves some satisfaction, on both sides, for the mortifications past.

I confess I could not hear all this without being moved very much; and yet I continued a little stiff and formal, too, a good while. I told him, that before I could give him any reply to the rest of his discourse, I ought to give him the satisfaction of telling him that his son was alive, and that, indeed, since I saw him so concerned about it, and mention it with such affection, I was sorry that I had not found out some way or other to let him know it sooner; but that I thought, after his slighting the mother, as above, he had summed up his affection to the child, in the letter he had wrote to me about providing for it; and that he had, as other fathers often do, looked upon it as a birth which being out of the way, was to be forgotten, as its beginning was to be repented of; that in providing sufficiently for it, he had done more than all such fathers used to do, and might be well satisfied with it.

He answered me, that he should have been very glad if I had been so good but to have given him the satisfaction of knowing the poor unfortunate creature was yet alive, and he would have taken some care of it upon himself; and particularly, by owning it for a legitimate child, which, where nobody had known to the contrary, would have taken off the infamy which would otherwise cleave to it; and so the child should not itself have known anything of its own disaster; but that he feared it was now too late.

He added, that I might see by all his conduct since that, what unhappy mistake drew him into the thing at first; and that he would have been very far from doing the injury to me, or being instrumental to add une miserable (that was his word) to the world, if he had not been drawn into it by the hopes he had of making me his own; but that, if it was possible to rescue the child from the consequences of its unhappy birth, he hoped I would give him leave to do it, and he would let me see that he had both means and affection still to do it; and that, notwithstanding all the misfortunes that had befallen him, nothing that belonged to him, especially by a mother he had such a concern for as he had for me, should ever want what he was in a condition to do for it.

I could not hear this without being sensibly touched with it; I was ashamed that he should show that he had more real affection for the child, though he had never seen it in his life, than I that bore it, for indeed I did not love the child, nor love to see it; and though I had provided for it, yet I did it by Amy's hand, and had not seen it above twice in four years, being privately resolved that when it grew up it should not be able to call me mother.

However, I told him the child was taken care of, and that he need not be anxious about it, unless he suspected that I had less affection for it than he that had never seen it in his life; that he knew what I had promised him to do for it, namely, to give it the thousand pistoles which I had offered him, and which he had declined; that I assured him I had made my will, and that I had left it 5,000*l.*, and the interest of it till he should come of age, if I died before that time; that I would still be as good as that to it; but if he had a mind to take it from me into his government, I would not be against it; and to satisfy him that I would perform what I said, I would cause the child to be delivered to him, and the 5,000*l.* also for its support, depending upon it that he would show himself a father to it by what I saw of his affection to it now.

I had observed that he had hinted two or three times in his discourse his having had misfortunes in the world, and I was a little surprised at the expression, especially at the repeating it so often; but I took no notice of that part yet.

He thanked me for my kindness to the child with a tenderness which showed the sincerity of all he had said before, and which increased the regret with which, as I said, I looked back on the little affection I had showed to the poor child.

He told me he did not desire to take him from me, but so as to introduce him into the world as his own, which he could still do, having lived absent from his other children (for he had two sons and a daughter which were brought up at Nimeguen, in Holland, with a sister of his) so long that he might very well send another son of ten years old to be bred up with them, and suppose his mother to be dead or alive, as he found occasion ; and that as I had resolved to do so handsomely for the child, he would add to it something considerable, though having had some great disappointments (repeating the words), he could not do for it as he would otherwise have done.

I then thought myself obliged to take notice of his having so often mentioned his having met with disappointments. I told him I was very sorry to hear he had met with anything afflicting to him in the world ; that I would not have anything belonging to me add to his loss, or weaken him in what he might do for his other children ; and that I would not agree to his having the child away, though the proposal was infinitely to the child's advantage, unless he would promise me that the whole expense should be mine, and that if he did not think 5,000*l.* enough for the child, I would give it more.

We had so much discourse upon this and the old affairs, that it took up all our time at his first visit. I was a little importunate with him to tell me how he came to find me out, but he put it off for that time, and only obtaining my leave to visit me again, he went away ; and indeed my heart was so full with what he had said already, that I was glad when he went away. Sometimes I was full of tenderness and affection for him, and especially when he expressed himself so earnestly and passionately about the child ; other times I was crowded with doubts about his circumstances ; sometimes I was terrified with apprehensions lest if I should come into a close correspondence with him, he should any way come to hear what kind of life I had led at Pall Mall and in other places, and it might make me miserable afterwards ; from which last thought I concluded that I had better repulse him again than receive him. All these thoughts, and many more, crowded in so fast, I say, upon me, that I wanted to give vent to them, and get rid of him, and was very glad when he was gone away.

We had several meetings after this, in which still we had so many preliminaries to go through, that we scarce ever bordered upon the main subject; once, indeed, he said something of it, and I put it off with a kind of a jest. Alas! says I, those things are out of the question now; 'tis almost two ages since those things were talked between us, says I. You see I am grown an old woman since that. Another time he gave a little push at it again, and I laughed again. Why, what dost thou talk of? said I, in a formal way, dost thou not see I am turned Quaker? I cannot speak of those things now. Why, says he, the Quakers marry as well as other people, and love one another as well; besides, says he, the Quakers' dress does not ill become you, and so jested with me again, and so it went off for a third time; however, I began to be kind to him in process of time, as they call it, and we grew very intimate; and if the following accident had not unluckily intervened, I had certainly married him, or consented to marry him, the very next time he had asked me.

I had long waited for a letter from Amy, who, it seems, was just at that time gone to Rouen the second time, to make her inquiries about him; and I received a letter from her at this unhappy juncture, which gave me the following account of my business:

I. That for my gentleman, who I had now, as may say, in my arms, she said he had been gone from Paris, as I have hinted, having met with some great losses and misfortunes; that he had been in Holland on that very account, whither he had also carried his children; that he was after that settled for some time at Rouen; that she had been at Rouen, and found there (by a mere accident), from a Dutch skipper, that he was at London, had been there above three years, that he was to be found upon the Exchange, on the French walk, and that he lodged at St. Laurence Pountney's-lane, and the like; so Amy said she supposed I might soon find him out, but that she doubted he was poor, and not worth looking after. This she did because of the next clause, which the jade had most mind to on many accounts.

II. That as to the Prince ———; that, as above, he was gone into Germany, where his estate lay; that he had quitted the French service, and lived retired; that she had seen his gentleman, who remained at Paris to solicit his arrears, &c.; that he had given her an account how his lord had employed him to inquire for me, and find me out, as above, and told her what pains he had taken to find me; that he had understood that I was gone to England; that he once had orders to go to England to find me; that his lord had resolved, if he could have found me, to have called me a countess, and so have married me, and have carried me into Germany with him; and that his commission was still to assure me that the prince would marry me if I would come to him, and that he would send him an account that he had found me, and did not doubt but he would have orders to come over to England to attend me in a figure suitable to my quality.

Amy, an ambitious jade, who knew my weakest part, namely, that I loved great things, and that I loved to be flattered and courted, said abundance of kind things upon this occasion, which she knew were suitable to me, and would prompt my vanity; and talked big of the prince's gentleman having orders to come over to me, with a procuration to marry me by proxy (as princes usually do in like cases), and to furnish me with an equipage, and I know not how many fine things; but told me withal, that she had not yet let him know that she belonged to me still, or that she knew where to find me, or to write to me; because she was willing to see the bottom of it, and whether it was a reality or a gasconade. She had indeed told him that if he had any such commission, she would endeavour to find me out, but no more.

III. For the Jew, she assured me that she had not been able to come at a certainty what was become of him, or in what part of the world he was; but that thus much she had learned from good hands, that he had committed a crime, in being concerned in a design to rob a rich banker at Paris; and that he was fled, and had not been heard of there for above six years.

IV. For that of my husband, the brewer, she learned, that being commanded into the field upon an occasion of some action in Flanders, he was wounded at the battle of Mons, and died of his wounds in the Hospital of the Invalids; so there was an end of my four inquiries, which I sent her over to make.

This account of the prince, and the return of his affection to me, with all the flattering great things which seemed to come along with it; and especially as they came gilded, and set out by my maid Amy; I say this account of the prince came to me in a very unlucky hour, and in the very crisis of my affair.

The merchant and I had entered into close conferences upon the grand affair. I had left off talking my platonic, and of my independency, and being a free woman, as before; and he having cleared up my doubts too, as to his circumstances, and the misfortunes he had spoken of, I had gone so far, that we had begun to consider where we should live, and in what figure, what equipage, what house, and the like.

I had made some harangues upon the delightful retirement of a country life, and how we might enjoy ourselves so effectually without the incumbrances of business and the world; but all this was grimace, and purely because I was afraid to make any public appearance in the world, for fear some impertinent person of quality should chop upon me again, and cry out, Roxana, Roxana, by —, with an oath, as had been done before.

My merchant, bred to business, and used to converse among men of business, could hardly tell how to live without it; at least it appeared he should be like a fish out of water, uneasy and dying; but however, he joined with me, only argued that we might live as near London as we could, that he might sometimes come to 'Change, and hear how the world should go abroad, and how it fared with his friends and his children.

I answered, that if he chose still to embarrass himself with business, I supposed it would be more to his satisfaction to be in his own country, and where his family was so well known, and where his children also were.

He smiled at the thoughts of that, and let me know, that he should be very willing to embrace such an offer, but that he could not expect it of me, to whom England was, to be sure, so naturalized now, as that it would be carrying me out of my native country, which he would not desire by any means, however agreeable it might be to him.

I told him he was mistaken in me; that as I had told him so much of a married state being a captivity, and the family being a house of bondage, that when I married I expected to be but an upper servant; so, if I did notwithstanding submit to it, I hoped he should see I knew how to act the servant's part, and do everything to oblige my master; that if I did not resolve to go with him wherever he desired to go, he might depend I would never have him. And did I not, said I, offer myself to go with you to the East Indies?

All this while this was indeed but a copy of my countenance; for as my circumstances would not admit of my stay in London, at least not so as to appear publicly, I resolved, if I took him, to live remote in the country, or go out of England with him.

But in an evil hour, just now came Amy's letter, in the very middle of all these discourses; and the fine things she had said about the prince began to make strange work with me; the notion of being a princess, and going over to live where all that had happened here would have been quite sunk out of knowledge as well as out of memory (conscience excepted), was mighty taking; the thoughts of being surrounded with domestics, honoured with titles, be called her highness, and live in all the splendour of a court, and which was still more, in the arms of a man of such rank, and who I knew loved and valued me; all this, in a word, dazzled my eyes, turned my head, and I was as truly crazed and distracted, for about a fortnight, as most of the people in Bedlam, though perhaps not quite so far gone.

When my gentleman came to me the next time, I had no notion of him, I wished I had never received him at all; in short, I resolved to have no more to say to him, so I feigned myself indisposed; and though I did come down to him, and speak to him a little, yet I let him see that I was so ill that I was (as we say) no company, and that it would be kind in him to give me leave to quit him for that time.

The next morning he sent a footman to inquire how I did; and I let him know I had a violent cold, and was very ill with it; two days after he came again, and I let him see me again, but feigned myself so hoarse that I could not speak to be heard, and that it was painful to me but to whisper; and, in a word, I held him in this suspense near three weeks.

During this time I had a strange elevation upon my mind; and the prince, or the spirit of him, had such a possession of me, that I spent most of this time in the realizing all the great things of a life with the prince, to my mind, pleasing my fancy with the grandeur I was supposing myself to enjoy, and withal, wickedly studying in what manner to put off this gentleman, and be rid of him for ever.

I cannot but say that sometimes the baseness of the action stuck hard with me; the honour and sincerity with which he had always treated me, and, above all, the fidelity he had showed me at Paris, and that I owed my life to him; I say, all these stared in my face, and I frequently argued with myself upon the obligation I was under to him, and how base would it be, now too, after so many obligations and engagements, to cast him off.

But the title of highness, and of a princess, and all those fine things, as they came in, weighed down all this; and the sense of gratitude vanished as if it had been a shadow.

At other times I considered the wealth I was mistress of; that I was able to live like a princess, though not a princess; and that my merchant (for he had told me all the affair of his misfortunes) was far from being poor, or even mean; that together, we were able to make up an estate of between three and four thousand pounds a year, which was in itself equal to some princes abroad. But though this was true, yet the name of princess, and the flutter of it, in a word, the pride, weighed them down; and all these arguings generally ended to the disadvantage of my merchant; so that, in short, I resolved to drop him, and give him a final answer at his next coming; namely, that something had happened in my affairs, which had caused me to alter my measures unexpectedly; and, in a word, to desire him to trouble himself no farther.

I think, verily, this rude treatment of him was for some time the effect of a violent fermentation in my blood; for the very motion which the steady contemplation of my fancied greatness had put my spirits into, had thrown me into a kind of fever, and I scarce knew what I did.

I have wondered since that it did not make me mad; nor do I now think it strange to hear of those who have been quite lunatic with their pride, that fancied themselves queens and empresses, and have made their attendants serve them upon the knee, given visitors their hand to kiss, and the like; for certainly, if pride will not turn the brain, nothing can.

However, the next time my gentleman came, I had not courage enough, or not ill-nature enough, to treat him in the rude manner I had resolved to do, and it was very well I did not; for soon after, I had another letter from Amy, in which was the mortifying news, and indeed surprising to me, that my prince (as I with a secret pleasure had called him) was very much hurt by a bruise he had received in hunting and engaging with a wild boar; a cruel and desperate sport, which the noblemen of Germany, it seems, much delight in.

This alarmed me indeed, and the more, because Amy wrote me word that his gentleman was gone away express to him, not without apprehensions that he should find his master was dead before his coming home; but that he (the gentleman) had promised her that as soon as he arrived he would send back the same courier to her with an account of his master's health, and of the main affair; and that he had obliged Amy to stay at Paris fourteen days for his return; she having promised him before to make it her business to go to England and to find me out for his lord if he sent her such orders; and he was to send her a bill for fifty pistoles for her journey. So Amy told me she waited for the answer.

This was a blow to me several ways; for, first, I was in a state of uncertainty as to his person, whether he was alive or dead; and I was not unconcerned in that part, I assure you; for I had an inexpressible affection remaining for his person, besides the degree to which it was revived by the view of a firmer interest in him; but this was not all, for in losing him I for ever lost the prospect of all the gaiety and glory that had made such an impression upon my imagination.

In this state of uncertainty, I say, by Amy's letter, I was like still to remain another fortnight; and had I now continued the resolution of using my merchant in the rude manner I once intended, I had made perhaps a sorry piece of work of it indeed, and it was very well my heart failed me as it did.

However, I treated him with a great many shuffles, and feigned stories to keep him off from any closer conferences than we had already had, that I might act afterwards as occasion might offer, one way or other; but that which mortified me most was, that Amy did not write, though the fourteen days were expired. At last, to my great surprise, when I was with the utmost impatience looking out at the window, expecting the postman that usually brought the foreign letters, I say, I was agreeably surprised to see a coach come to the yard-gate where we lived, and my woman, Amy, alight out of it, and come towards the door, having the coachman bringing several bundles after her.

I flew like lightning down stairs to speak to her, but was soon damped with her news. Is the prince alive or dead, Amy? says I. She spoke coldly and slightly: He is alive, madam, said she, but it is not much matter; I had as lieu he had been dead. So we went up stairs again to my chamber, and there we began a serious discourse of the whole matter.

First, she told me a long story of his being hurt by a wild boar, and of the condition he was reduced to, so that every one expected he should die, the anguish of the wound having thrown him into a fever, with abundance of circumstances too long to relate here; how he recovered of that extreme danger, but continued very weak; how the gentleman had been homme de parole, and had sent back the courier as punctually as if it had been to the king; that he had given a long account of his lord, and of his illness and recovery; but the sum of the matter, as to me, was, that as to the lady, his lord was turned penitent, was under some vows for his recovery, and could not think any more on that affair; and especially, the lady being gone, and that it had not been offered to her, so there was no breach of honour; but that his lord was sensible of the good offices of Mrs. Amy, and had sent her the fifty pistoles for her trouble, as if she had really gone the journey.

I was, I confess, hardly able to bear the first surprise of this disappointment. Amy saw it, and gapes out (as was her way), Law'd, madam! never be concerned at it; you see he is gotten among the priests, and I suppose they have saucily imposed some penance upon him, and it may be, sent him of an errand bare-foot to some Madonna or Nostredame, or other; and he is off of his amours for the present. I'll warrant you he'll be as wicked again as ever he was when he is got thorough well, and gets but out of their hands again. I hate this out-o'-season-repentance; what occasion had he, in his repentance, to be off of taking a good wife? I should have been glad to see you have been a princess, and all that; but if it can't be, never afflict yourself; you are rich enough to be a princess to yourself; you don't want him, that's the best of it.

Well, I cried for all that, and was heartily vexed, and that a great while; but as Amy was always at my elbow, and always jogging it out of my head with her mirth and her wit, it wore off again.

Then I told Amy all the story of my merchant, and how he had found me out when I was in such a concern to find him; how it was true that he lodged in St. Lawrence Pountney's-lane; and how I had had all the story of his misfortune, which she had heard of, in which he had lost above 8,000*l.* sterling; and that he had told me frankly of it before she had sent me any account of it, or at least before I had taken any notice that I had heard of it.

Amy was very joyful at that part. Well, madam, then, says Amy, what need you value the story of the prince; and going I know not whither into Germany to lay your bones in another world, and learn the devil's language, called High Dutch? You are better here by half, says Amy. Law'd, madam, says she, why, are you not as rich as Crassus?

Well, it was a great while still before I could bring myself off of this fancied sovereignty; and I that was so willing once to be mistress to a king, was now ten thousand times more fond of being wife to a prince.

So fast a hold has pride and ambition upon our minds, that when once it gets admission, nothing is so chimerical, but, under this possession, we can form ideas of in our fancy, and realize to our imagination. Nothing can be so ridiculous as the simple steps we take in such cases; a man or a woman becomes a mere malade imaginaire, and I believe may as easily die with grief or run mad with joy (as the affair in his fancy appears right or wrong), as if all was real, and actually under the management of the person.

I had indeed two assistants to deliver me from this snare, and these were, first, Amy, who knew my disease but was able to do nothing as to the remedy; the second, the merchant, who really brought the remedy, but knew nothing of the distemper.

I remember when all these disorders were upon my thoughts, in one of the visits my friend the merchant made me, he took notice that he perceived I was under some unusual disorder; he believed, he said, that my distemper, whatever it was, lay much in my head, and it being summer weather, and very hot, proposed to me to go a little way into the air.

I started at his expression : What, says I, do you think then that I am crazed ? You should then propose a madhouse for my cure. No, no, says he, I do not mean anything like that ; I hope the head may be distempered and not the brain. Well, I was too sensible that he was right, for I knew I had acted a strange wild kind of part with him ; but he insisted upon it, and pressed me to go into the country. I took him short again, What need you, says I, send me out of your way ? It is in your power to be less troubled with me, and with less inconvenience to us both.

He took that ill, and told me I used to have a better opinion of his sincerity ; and desired to know what he had done to forfeit my charity. I mention this only to let you see how far I had gone in my measures of quitting him, that is to say, how near I was of showing him how base, ungrateful, and how vilely I could act ; but I found I had carried the jest far enough, and that a little matter might have made him sick of me again, as he was before ; so I began, by little and little, to change my way of talking to him, and to come to discourse to the purpose again, as we had done before.

A while after this, when we were very merry, and talking familiarly together, he called me, with an air of particular satisfaction, his princess. I coloured at the word, for it indeed touched me to the quick ; but he knew nothing of the reason of my being touched with it : What d'ye mean by that ? said I. Nay, says he, I mean nothing but that you are a princess to me. Well, says I, as to that I am content, and yet I could tell you I might have been a princess if I would have quitted you, and believe I could be so still. It is not in my power to make you a princess, says he, but I can easily make you a lady here in England, and a countess too if you will go out of it.

I heard both with a great deal of satisfaction, for my pride remained, though it had been balked, and I thought with myself that this proposal would make me some amends for the loss of the title that had so tickled my imagination another way, and I was impatient to understand what he meant ; but I would not ask him, by any means ; so it passed off for that time.

When he was gone, I told Amy what he had said, and Amy was as impatient to know the manner how it could be, as I was ; but the next time (perfectly unexpected to me) he told me that he had accidentally mentioned a thing to me last time he was with me, having not the least thought of the thing itself; but not knowing but such a thing might be of some weight to me, and that it might bring me respect among people where I might appear, he had thought since of it, and was resolved to ask me about it.

I made light of it, and told him that as he knew I had chosen a retired life, it was of no value to me to be called lady or countess either; but that if he intended to drag me, as I might call it, into the world again, perhaps it might be agreeable to him; but besides that, I could not judge of the thing, because I did not understand how either of them was to be done.

He told me that money purchased titles of honour in almost all parts of the world; though money could not give principles of honour, they must come by birth and blood; that however, titles sometimes assist to elevate the soul, and to infuse generous principles into the mind, and especially where there was a good foundation laid in the persons; that he hoped we should neither of us misbehave if we came to it; and that as we knew how to wear a title without undue elevations, so it might sit as well upon us as on another; that as to England, he had nothing to do but to get an act of naturalization in his favour, and he knew where to purchase a patent for baronet, that is to say, to have the honour and title transferred to him; but if I intended to go abroad with him, he had a nephew, the son of his eldest brother, who had the title of count, with the estate annexed, which was but small, and that he had frequently offered to make it over to him for a thousand pistoles, which was not a great deal of money, and considering it was in the family already, he would, upon my being willing, purchase it immediately.

I told him I liked the last best; but then I would not let him buy it unless he would let me pay the thousand pistoles. No, no, says he, I refused a thousand pistoles that I had more right to have accepted than that, and you shall not be at so much expense now. Yes, says I, you did refuse it, and perhaps repented it afterwards. I never complained, said he. But I did, says I, and often repented it for you. I do not understand you, says he. Why, said I, I repented that I suffered you to refuse it. Well, well, said he, we may talk of that hereafter, when you shall resolve which part of the world you will make your settled residence in. Here he talked very handsomely to me, and for a good while together; how it had been his lot to live all his days out of his native country, and to be often shifting and changing the situation of his affairs; and that I myself had not always had a fixed abode, but that now, as neither of us was very young, he fancied I would be for taking up our abode where, if possible, we might remove no more; that as to his part, he was of that opinion entirely, only with this exception, that the choice of the place should be mine, for that all places in the world were alike to him, only with this single addition, namely, that I was with him.

I heard him with a great deal of pleasure, as well for his being willing to give me the choice, as for that I resolved to live abroad, for the reason I have mentioned already, namely, lest I should at any time be known in England, and all that story of Roxana, and the balls, should come out; as also I was not a little tickled with the satisfaction of being still a countess, though I could not be a princess.

I told Amy all this story, for she was still my privy-councillor; but when I asked her opinion, she made me laugh heartily. Now, which of the two shall I take, Amy? said I; shall I be a lady, that is, a baronet's lady in England, or a countess in Holland? The ready-witted jade, that knew the pride of my temper too, almost as well as I did myself, answered (without the least hesitation), Both, madam: which of them? says she (repeating the words), why not both of them? and then you will be really a princess; for sure, to be a lady in English, and a countess in Dutch, may make a princess in High Dutch. Upon the whole, though Amy was in jest, she put the thought into my head, and I resolved, that, in short, I would be both of them, which I managed as you shall hear.

First, I seemed to resolve that I would live and settle in England, only with this condition, namely, that I would not live in London. I pretended that it would choke me up; that I wanted breath when I was in London, but that anywhere else I would be satisfied; and then I asked him whether any seaport town in England would not suit him? because I knew, though he seemed to leave off, he would always love to be among business, and conversing with men of business; and I named several places, either nearest for business with France or with Holland ; as Dover, or Southampton, for the first ; and Ipswich, or Yarmouth, or Hull, for the last ; but I took care that we would resolve upon nothing ; only by this it seemed to be certain that we should live in England.

It was time now to bring things to a conclusion, and so in about six weeks' time more we settled all our preliminaries ; and, among the rest, he let me know that he should have the bill for his naturalization passed time enough, so that he would be (as he called it) an Englishman before we married. That was soon perfected, the parliament being then sitting, and several other foreigners joining in the said bill to save the expense.

It was not above three or four days after, but that, without giving me the least notice that he had so much as been about the patent for baronet, he brought it me in a fine embroidered bag, and saluting me by the name of my Lady — (joining his own surname to it), presented it to me with his picture set with diamonds, and at the same time gave me a breast-jewel worth a thousand pistoles, and the next morning we were married. Thus I put an end to all the intriguing part of my life ; a life full of prosperous wickedness ; the reflections upon which were so much the more afflicting, as the time had been spent in the grossest crimes, which, the more I looked back upon, the more black and horrid they appeared, effectually drinking up all the comfort and satisfaction which I might otherwise have taken in that part of life which was still before me.

The first satisfaction, however, that I took in the new condition I was in, was in reflecting that at length the life of crime was over, and that I was like a passenger coming back from the Indies, who having, after many years' fatigues and hurry in business, gotten a good estate, with innumerable difficulties and hazards, is arrived safe at London with all his effects, and has the pleasure of saying he shall never venture upon the seas any more.

When we were married, we came back immediately to my lodgings (for the church was but just by), and we were so privately married, that none but Amy and my friend the Quaker was acquainted with it. As soon as we came into the house, he took me in his arms, and kissing me, Now you are my own, says he ; O ! that you had been so good to have done this eleven years ago. Then, said I, you, perhaps, would have been tired of me long ago; it is much better now, for now all our happy days are to come; besides, said I, I should not have been half so rich, but that I said to myself, for there was no letting him into the reason of it. O! says he, I should not have been tired of you; but besides having the satisfaction of your company, it had saved me that unlucky blow at Paris, which was a dead loss to me of above eight thousand pistoles, and all the fatigues of so many years' hurry and business; and then he added, but I'll make you pay for it all now I have you. I startled a little at the words. Ay, said I, do you threaten already? Pray what d'ye mean by that? and began to look a little grave.

I'll tell you, says he, very plainly, what I mean; and still he held me fast in his arms. I intend from this time never to trouble myself with any more business, so I shall never get one shilling for you more than I have already; all that you will lose, one way; next, I intend not to trouble myself with any of the care or trouble of managing what either you have for me, or what I have to add to it; but you shall e'en take it all upon yourself, as the wives do in Holland, so you will pay for it that way too, for all the drudgery shall be yours; thirdly, I intend to condemn you to the constant bondage of my impertinent company, for I shall tie you like a pedlar's pack at my back, I shall scarce ever be from you; for I am sure I can take delight in nothing else in this world. Very well, says I, but I am pretty heavy, I hope you'll set me down sometimes when you are a weary. As for that, says he, tire me if you can.

This was all jest and allegory; but it was all true, in the moral of the fable, as you shall hear in its place. We were very merry the rest of the day, but without any noise or clutter; for he brought not one of his acquaintance or friends, either English or foreigner. The honest Quaker provided us a very noble dinner indeed, considering how few we were to eat it; and every day that week she did the like, and would, at last, have it be all at her own charge, which I was utterly averse to; first, because I knew her circumstances not to be very great, though not very low; and next, because she had been so true a friend, and so cheerful a comforter to me, ay, and counsellor too, in all this affair, that I had resolved to make her a present that should be some help to her when all was over.

But to return to the circumstances of our wedding; after being very merry, as I have told you, Amy and the Quaker put us to bed, the honest Quaker little thinking we had been a-bed together eleven years before; nay, that was a secret which, as it happened, Amy herself did not know. Amy grinned and made faces, as if she had been pleased; but it came out in so many words, when he was not by, the sum of her mumbling and muttering was, that this should have been done ten or a dozen years before; that it would signify little now; that was to say, in short, that her mistress was pretty near fifty, and too old to have any children. I chid her, the Quaker laughed, complimented me upon my not being so old as Amy pretended, that I could not be above forty, and might have a house full of children yet; but Amy and I too knew better than she how it was, for, in short, I was old enough to have done breeding, however I looked; but I made her hold her tongue.

In the morning my Quaker landlady came and visited us before we were up, and made us eat cakes and drink chocolate in bed; and then left us again and bid us take a nap upon it, which I believe we did; in short, she treated us so handsomely, and with such an agreeable cheerfulness, as well as plenty, as made it appear to me that Quakers may, and that this Quaker did, understand good manners as well as any other people.

I resisted her offer, however, of treating us for the whole week; and I opposed it so long that I saw evidently that she took it ill, and would have thought herself slighted if we had not accepted it; so I said no more, but let her go on, only told her I would be even with her; and so I was. However, for that week she treated us as she said she would, and did it so very fine, and with such a profusion of all sorts of good things, that the greatest burthen to her was, how to dispose of things that were left; for she never let anything, how dainty, or however large, be so much as seen twice among us.

I had some servants indeed, which helped her off a little; that is to say, two maids, for Amy was now a woman of business, not a servant, and eat always with us; I had also a coachman and a boy; my Quaker had a man-servant too, but had but one maid; but she borrowed two more of some of her friends for the occasion, and had a man-cook for dressing the victuals.

She was only at a loss for plate, which she gave me a whisper of; and I made Amy fetch a large strong box, which I had lodged in a safe hand, in which was all the fine plate which I had provided on a worse occasion, as is mentioned before; and I put it into the Quaker's hand, obliging her not to use it as mine, but as her own, for a reason I shall mention presently.

I was now my Lady ——, and I must own I was exceedingly pleased with it; 'twas so big and so great, to hear myself called 'her ladyship,' and 'your ladyship,' and the like, that I was like the Indian king at Virginia, who having a house built for him by the English, and a lock put upon the door, would sit whole days together with the key in his hand, locking and unlocking, and double-locking the door, with an unaccountable pleasure at the novelty; so I could have sat a whole day together to hear Amy talk to me, and call me 'your ladyship' at every word; but after a while the novelty wore off, and the pride of it abated, till at last truly I wanted the other title as much as I did that of ladyship before.

We lived this week in all the innocent mirth imaginable, and our good-humoured Quaker was so pleasant in her way, that it was particularly entertaining to us. We had no music at all, or dancing; only I now and then sung a French song to divert my spouse, who desired it, and the privacy of our mirth greatly added to the pleasure of it. I did not make many clothes for my wedding, having always a great many rich clothes by me, which, with a little altering for the fashion, were perfectly new. The next day he pressed me to dress, though we had no company; at last, jesting with him, I told him I believed I was able to dress me so, in one kind of dress that I had by me, that he would not know his wife when he saw her, especially if anybody else was by. No! he said, that was impossible, and he longed to see that dress. I told him I would dress me in it, if he would promise me never to desire me to appear in it before company; he promised he would not, but wanted to know why too; as husbands, you know, are inquisitive creatures, and love to inquire after anything they think is kept from them; but I had an answer ready for him; Because, said I, it is not a decent dress in this country, and would not look modest; neither indeed would it, for it was but one degree off from appearing in one's shift, but was the usual wear in the country where they were used. He was satisfied with my answer, and gave me his promise never to ask me to be seen in it before company. I then withdrew, taking only Amy and the Quaker with me; and Amy dressed me in my old Turkish habit which I danced in formerly, &c., as before. The Quaker was charmed with the dress, and merrily said, that if such a dress should come to be worn here, she should not know what to do, she should be tempted not to dress in the Quakers' way any more.

When all the dress was put on, I loaded it with jewels, and in particular, I placed the large breast-jewel which he had given me of a thousand pistoles, upon the front of the tyhaia, or head-dress, where it made a most glorious show indeed. I had my own diamond necklace on, and my hair was tout brilliant, all glittering with jewels.

His picture set with diamonds I had placed stitched to my vest, just, as might be supposed, upon my heart (which is the compliment in such cases among the eastern people), and all being open at the breast, there was no room for anything of a jewel there. In this figure, Amy holding the train of my robe, I came down to him. He was surprised, and perfectly astonished. He knew me, to be sure, because I had prepared him, and because there was nobody else there but the Quaker and Amy; but he by no means knew Amy, for she had dressed herself in the habit of a Turkish slave, being the garb of my little Turk which I had at Naples, as I have said; she had her neck and arms bare, was bareheaded, and her hair braided in a long tassel hanging down her back; but the jade could neither hold her countenance or her chattering tongue, so as to be concealed long.

Well, he was so charmed with this dress that he would have me sit and dine in it; but it was so thin, and so open before, and the weather being also sharp, that I was afraid of taking cold; however, the fire being enlarged, and the doors kept shut, I sat to oblige him, and he professed he never saw so fine a dress in his life. I afterwards told him that my husband (so he called the jeweller that was killed) bought it for me at Leghorn, with a young Turkish slave which I parted with at Paris; and that it was by the help of that slave that I learned how to dress in it, and how everything was to be worn, and many of the Turkish customs also, with some of their language. This story agreeing with the fact, only changing the person, was very natural, and so it went off with him ; but there was good reason why I should not receive any company in this dress, that is to say, not in England ; I need not repeat it, you will hear more of it.

But when I came abroad, I frequently put it on, and upon two or three occasions danced in it, but always at his request.

We continued at the Quaker's lodgings for above a year ; for now making as though it was difficult to determine where to settle in England to his satisfaction, unless in London, which was not to mine, I pretended to make him an offer, that to oblige him, I began to incline to go and live abroad with him ; that I knew nothing could be more agreeable to him, and that as to me, every place was alike ; that as I had lived abroad without a husband so many years, it could be no burthen to me to live abroad again, especially with him. Then we fell to straining our courtesies upon one another ; he told me he was perfectly easy at living in England, and had squared all his affairs accordingly ; for that as he had told me he intended to give over all business in the world, as well the care of managing it, as the concern about it, seeing we were both in condition neither to want it or to have it be worth our while, so I might see it was his intention, by his getting himself naturalized, and getting the patent of baronet, &c. Well, for all that, I told him I accepted his compliment, but I could not but know that his native country, where his children were breeding up, must be most agreeable to him, and that if I was of such value to him, I would be there then, to enhance the rate of his satisfaction ; that wherever he was, would be a home to me, and any place in the world would be England to me if he was with me ; and thus, in short, I brought him to give me leave to oblige him with going to live abroad, when in truth I could not have been perfectly easy at living in England, unless I had kept constantly within doors ; lest some time or other the dissolute life I had lived here should have come to be known, and all those wicked things have been known too, which I now began to be very much ashamed of.

When we closed up our wedding week, in which our Quaker had been so very handsome to us, I told him how much I thought we were obliged to her for her generous carriage to us ; how she had acted the kindest part through the whole, and how faithful a friend she had been to me upon all occasions; and then letting him know a little of her family unhappiness, I proposed that I thought I not only ought to be grateful to her, but really to do something extraordinary for her, towards making her easy in her affairs. And I added, that I had no hangers-on that should trouble him, that there was nobody belonged to me but what was thoroughly provided for; and that if I did something for this honest woman that was considerable, it should be the last gift I would give to anybody in the world but Amy; and as for her, we was not a going to turn her adrift, but whenever anything offered for her, we would do as we saw cause; that, in the mean time, Amy was not poor, that she had saved together between seven and eight hundred pounds; by the way, I did not tell him how, and by what wicked ways she had got it, but that she had it; and that was enough to let him know she would never be in want of us.

My spouse was exceedingly pleased with my discourse about the Quaker, made a kind of a speech to me upon the subject of gratitude, told me it was one of the brightest parts of a gentlewoman, that it was so twisted with honesty, nay, and even with religion too, that he questioned whether either of them could be found where gratitude was not to be found; that in this act there was not only gratitude but charity; and that to make the charity still more Christian-like, the object too had real merit to attract it; he therefore agreed to the thing with all his heart, only would have had me let him pay it out of his effects.

I told him, as for that, I did not design, whatever I had said formerly, that we should have two pockets; and that though I had talked to him of being a free woman, and an independent, and the like, and he had offered and promised that I should keep all my own estate in my own hands; yet, that since I had taken him, I would e'en do as other honest wives did, where I thought fit to give myself, I should give what I had too; that if I reserved anything it should be only in case of mortality, and that I might give it to his children afterwards, as my own gift; and that in short, if he thought fit to join stocks, we would see to-morrow morning what strength we could both make up in the world, and bringing it altogether, consider before we resolved upon the place of removing, how we should dispose of what we had, as well as of ourselves. This discourse was too obliging, and he too much a man of sense not to receive it as it was meant; he only answered, we would do in that as we should both agree; but the thing under our present care was to show not gratitude only, but charity and affection too, to our kind friend the Quaker; and the first word he spoke of was to settle a thousand pounds upon her for her life, that is to say, sixty pounds a year; but in such a manner as not to be in the power of any person to reach but herself. This was a great thing, and indeed showed the generous principles of my husband, and for that reason I mention it; but I thought that a little too much too, and particularly, because I had another thing in view for her about the plate, so I told him I thought if he gave her a purse with a hundred guineas as a present first, and then made her a compliment of 40% per annum for her life, secured any such way as she should desire, it would be very handsome.

He agreed to that; and the same day in the evening, when we were just going to bed, he took my Quaker by the hand, and with a kiss, told her, that we had been very kindly treated by her from the beginning of this affair, and his wife before, as she (meaning me) had informed him; and that he thought himself bound to let her see that she had obliged friends who knew how to be grateful; that for his part of the obligation he desired she would accept of that, for an acknowledgment in part only (putting the gold into her hand), and that his wife would talk with her about what farther he had to say to her; and upon that, not giving her time hardly to say 'thank ye,' away he went up stairs into our bedchamber, leaving her confused and not knowing what to say.

When he was gone, she began to make very handsome and obliging representations of her good will to us both, but that it was without expectation of reward; that I had given her several valuable presents before; and so indeed I had; for besides the piece of linen which I had given her at first, I had given her a suit of damask table-linen, of the linen I bought for my balls, viz., three table-cloths and three dozen of napkins, and at another time I gave her a little necklace of gold beads, and the like; but that is by the way; but she mentioned them, I say, and how she was obliged by me on many other occasions; that she was not in condition to show her gratitude any other way, not being able to make a suitable return; and that now we took from her all opportunity to balance my former friendship, and left her more in debt than she was before. She spoke this in a very good kind of a manner, in her own way, but which was very agreeable indeed, and had as much apparent sincerity, and I verily believe as real, as was possible to be expressed; but I put a stop to it, and bid her say no more, but accept of what my spouse had given her, which was but in part, as she had heard him say. And put it up, says I, and come and sit down here, and give me leave to say something else to you on the same head, which my spouse and I have settled between ourselves in your behalf. What dost thee mean? says she, and blushed, and looked surprised, but did not stir. She was going to speak again, but I interrupted her, and told her she should make no more apologies of any kind whatever, for I had better things than all this to talk to her of; so I went on, and told her, that as she had been so friendly and kind to us on every occasion, and that her house was the lucky place where we came together, and that she knew I was from her own mouth acquainted in part with her circumstances, we were resolved she should be the better for us as long as she lived. Then I told what we had resolved to do for her, and that she had nothing more to do but to consult with me how it should be effectually secured for her, distinct from any of the effects which were her husband's; and that if her husband did so supply her, that she could live comfortably, and not want it for bread or other necessaries, she should not make use of it, but lay up the income of it, and add it every year to the principal, so to increase the annual payment, which in time, and perhaps before she might come to want it, might double itself; that we were very willing whatever she should so lay up should be to herself, and whoever she thought fit after her; but that the forty pounds a year must return to our family after her life, which we both wished might be long and happy.

Let no reader wonder at my extraordinary concern for this poor woman, or at my giving my bounty to her a place in this account. It is not, I assure you, to make a pageantry of my charity, or to value myself upon the greatness of my soul, that should give in so profuse a manner as this, which was above my figure, if my wealth had been twice as much as it was; but there was another spring from whence all flowed, and 'tis on that account I speak of it. Was it possible I could think of a poor desolate woman with four children, and her husband gone from her, and perhaps good for little if he had stayed; I say, was I, that had tasted so deep of the sorrows of such a kind of widowhood, able to look on her, and think of her circumstances, and not be touched in an uncommon manner? No, no, I never looked on her and her family, though she was not left so helpless and friendless as I had been, without remembering my own condition, when Amy was sent out to pawn or sell my pair of stays to buy a breast of mutton and a bunch of turnips; nor could I look on her poor children, though not poor and perishing, like mine, without tears; reflecting on the dreadful condition that mine were reduced to, when poor Amy sent them all into their aunt's in Spitalfields, and run away from them. These were the original springs, or fountain-head, from whence my affectionate thoughts were moved to assist this poor woman.

When a poor debtor, having lain long in the Compter, or Ludgate, or the King's Bench, for debt, afterwards gets out, rises again in the world, and grows rich, such a one is a certain benefactor to the prisoners there, and perhaps to every prison he passes by as long as he lives, for he remembers the dark days of his own sorrow; and even those who never had the experience of such sorrows to stir up their minds to acts of charity, would have the same charitable good disposition, did they as sensibly remember what it is that distinguishes them from others by a more favourable and merciful providence.

This, I say, was, however, the spring of my concern for this honest, friendly, and grateful Quaker; and as I had so plentiful a fortune in the world, I resolved she should taste the fruit of her kind usage to me, in a manner that she could not expect.

All the while I talked to her I saw the disorder of her mind; the sudden joy was too much for her, and she coloured, trembled, changed, and at last grew pale, and was indeed near fainting; when she hastily rung a little bell for her maid, who coming in immediately, she beckoned to her, for speak she could not, to fill her a glass of wine, but she had no breath to take it in, and was almost choked with that which she took in her mouth. I saw she was ill, and assisted her what I could, and with spirits and things to smell to, just kept her from fainting, when she beckoned to her maid to withdraw, and immediately burst out in crying, and that relieved her. When she recovered herself a little, she flew to me, and throwing her arms about my neck, O! says she, thou hast almost killed me; and there she hung, laying her head in my neck for half a quarter of an hour, not able to speak, but sobbing like a child that had been whipped.

I was very sorry that I did not stop a little in the middle of my discourse, and make her drink a glass of wine before it had put her spirits into such a violent motion; but it was too late, and it was ten to one odds but that it had killed her.

But she came to herself at last, and began to say some very good things in return for my kindness; I would not let her go on, but told her I had more to say to her still than all this, but that I would let it alone till another time; my meaning was, about the box of plate, good part of which I gave her, and some I gave to Amy, for I had so much plate, and some so large, that I thought if I let my husband see it, he might be apt to wonder what occasion I could ever have for so much, and for plate of such a kind too; as particularly, a great cistern for bottles, which cost a hundred and twenty pounds, and some large candlesticks, too big for any ordinary use. These I caused Amy to sell; in short, Amy sold above three hundred pounds' worth of plate; what I gave the Quaker was worth above sixty pounds, and I gave Amy above thirty pounds' worth, and yet I had a great deal left for my husband.

Nor did our kindness to the Quaker end with the forty pounds a year, for we were always, while we stayed with her, which was above ten months, giving her one good thing or another; and, in a word, instead of lodging with her, she boarded with us, for I kept the house, and she and all her family eat and drank with us, and yet we paid her the rent of the house too; in short, I remembered my widowhood, and I made this widow's heart glad many a day the more upon that account.

And now my spouse and I began to think of going over to Holland, where I had proposed to him to live, and in order to settle all the preliminaries of our future manner of living, I began to draw in my effects, so as to have them all at command, upon whatever occasion we thought fit; after which, one morning I called my spouse up to me, Hark ye, sir, said I to him, I have two very weighty questions to ask of you; I don't know what answer you will give to the first, but I doubt you will be able to give but a sorry answer to the other, and yet, I assure you, it is of the last importance to yourself, and towards the future part of your life, wherever it is to be.

He did not seem to be much alarmed, because he could see I was speaking in a kind of merry way. Let's hear your questions, my dear, says he, and I'll give the best answer I can to them. Why first, says I,

I. You have married a wife here, made her a lady, and put her in expectation of being something else still when she comes abroad; pray have you examined whether you are able to supply all her extravagant demands when she comes abroad; and maintain an expensive Englishwoman in all her pride and vanity? In short, have you inquired whether you are able to keep her?

II. You have married a wife here, and given her a great many fine things, and you maintain her like a princess, and sometimes call her so; pray what portion have you had with her? what fortune has she been to you? and where does her estate lie, that you keep her so fine? I am afraid you keep her in a figure a great deal above her estate, at least above all that you have seen of it yet? Are you sure you ha'n't got a bite? and that you have not made a beggar a lady?

Well, says he, have you any more questions to ask? let's have them altogether, perhaps they may be all answered in a few words, as well as these two. No, says I, these are the two grand questions, at least for the present. Why, then, says he, I'll answer you in a few words; that I am fully master of my own circumstances, and without farther inquiry, can let my wife you speak of know, that as I have made her a lady I can maintain her as a lady, wherever she goes with me; and this whether I have one pistole of her portion, or whether she has any portion or no; and as I have not inquired whether she has any portion or not, so she shall not have the less respect showed her from me, or be obliged to live meaner, or be anyways straitened on that account; on the contrary, if she goes abroad to live with me in my own country, I will make her more than a lady, and support the expense of it too, without meddling with anything she has; and this, I suppose, says he, contains an answer to both your questions together.

He spoke this with a great deal more earnestness in his countenance, than I had when I proposed my questions; and said a great many kind things upon it, as the consequence of former discourses, so that I was obliged to be in earnest too. My dear, says I, I was but in jest in my questions; but they were proposed to introduce what I am going to say to you in earnest; namely, that if I am to go abroad, 'tis time I should let you know how things stand, and what I have to bring you with your wife; how it is to be disposed and secured, and the like; and therefore come, says I, sit down, and let me show you your bargain here; I hope you will find that you have not got a wife without a fortune.

He told me then, that since he found I was in earnest, he desired that I would adjourn it till to-morrow, and then we would do as the poor people do after they marry, feel in their pockets, and see how much money they can bring together in the world. Well, says I, with all my heart; and so we ended our talk for that time.

As this was in the morning, my spouse went out after dinner to his goldsmith's, as he said, and about three hours after returns with a porter and two large boxes with him; and his servant brought another box, which I observed was almost as heavy as the two that the porter brought, and made the poor fellow sweat heartily; he dismissed the porter, and in a little while after went out again with his man, and returning at night, brought another porter with more boxes and bundles, and all was carried up, and put into a chamber, next to our bedchamber; and in the morning he called for a pretty large round table, and began to unpack.

When the boxes were opened, I found they were chiefly full of books, and papers, and parchments, I mean books of accounts, and writings, and such things, as were in themselves of no moment to me, because I understood them not; but I perceived he took them all out, and spread them about him upon the table and chairs, and began to be very busy with them; so I withdrew and left him; and he was indeed so busy among them, that he never missed me till I had been gone a good while; but when he had gone through all his papers, and come to open a little box, he called for me again. Now, says he, and called me his countess, I am ready to answer your first question: if you will sit down till I have opened this box, we will see how it stands.

So we opened the box; there was in it indeed what I did not expect, for I thought he had sunk his estate rather than raised it; but he produced me in goldsmiths' bills, and stock in the English East India Company, about sixteen thousand pounds sterling; then he gave into my hands nine assignments upon the bank of Lyons in France, and two upon the rents of the town-house in Paris, amounting in the whole to 5,800 crowns per annum, or annual rent, as it is called there; and lastly, the sum of 30,000 rixdollars in the bank of Amsterdam; besides some jewels and gold in the box, to the value of about 15 or 1,600*l.*, among which was a very good necklace of pearl of about 200*l.* value; and that he pulled out and tied about my neck, telling me that should not be reckoned into the account.

I was equally pleased and surprised, and it was with an inexpressible joy that I saw him so rich.

You might well tell me, said I, that you were able to make me countess, and maintain me as such. In short, he was immensely rich; for besides all this, he showed me, which was the reason of his being so busy among the books, I say, he showed me several adventures he had abroad in the business of his merchandise; as particularly an eighth share in an East India ship then abroad; an account-courant with a merchant at Cadiz in Spain; about 3,000*l.* lent upon bottomry, upon ships gone to the Indies; and a large cargo of goods in a merchant's hands, for sale at Lisbon in Portugal; so that in his books there was about 12,000*l.* more; all which put together, made about 27,000*l.* sterling, and 1,320*l.* a year.

I stood amazed at this account, as well I might, and said nothing to him for a good while, and the rather because I saw him still busy looking over his books. After a while, as I was going to express my wonder, Hold, my dear, says he, this is not all neither; then he pulled me out some old seals, and small parchment rolls, which I did not understand; but he told me they were a right of reversion which he had to a paternal estate in his family, and a mortgage of 14,000*l.* rixdollars, which he had upon it, in the hands of the present possessor; so that was about 3,000*l.* more.

But now hold again, says he, for I must pay my debts out of all this, and they are very great, I assure you; and the first, he said, was a black article of 8,000 pistoles, which he had a lawsuit about at Paris, but had it awarded against him, which was the loss he had told me of, and which made him leave Paris in disgust; that in other accounts he owed about 5,300*l.* sterling ; but after all this, upon the whole, he had still 17,000*l.* clear stock in money, and 1,320*l.* a year in rent.

After some pause, it came to my turn to speak. Well, says I, 'tis very hard a gentleman with such a fortune as this should come over to England, and marry a wife with nothing ; it shall never, says I, be said, but what I have, I'll bring into the public stock ; so I began to produce.

First, I pulled out the mortgage which good Sir Robert had procured for me, the annual rent 700*l.* per annum ; the principal money 14,000*l.*

Secondly, I pulled out another mortgage upon land, procured by the same faithful friend, which at three times had advanced 12,000*l.*

Thirdly, I pulled him out a parcel of little securities, procured by several hands, by fee-farm rents, and such petty mortgages as those times afforded, amounting to 10,800*l.* principal money, and paying six hundred and thirty-six pounds a year. So that in the whole there was two thousand and fifty-six pounds a year ready money constantly coming in.

When I had shown him all these, I laid them upon the table, and bade him take them, that he might be able to give me an answer to the second question, viz., What fortune he had with his wife ? and laughed a little at it.

He looked at them awhile, and then handed them all back again to me ; I will not touch them, says he, nor one of them, till they are all settled in trustees' hands for your own use, and the management wholly your own.

I cannot omit what happened to me while all this was acting ; though it was cheerful work in the main, yet I trembled every joint of me, worse for aught I know than ever Belshazzar did at the handwriting on the wall, and the occasion was every way as just. Unhappy wretch, said I to myself, shall my ill-got wealth, the product of prosperous lust, and of a vile and vicious life of whoredom and adultery, be intermingled with the honest well-gotten estate of this innocent gentleman, to be a moth and a caterpillar among it, and bring the judgments of heaven upon him, and upon what he has, for my sake ? Shall my wickedness blast his comforts ? Shall I be fire in his flax ? and be a means to provoke heaven to curse his blessings ? God forbid ! I'll keep them asunder if it be possible.

This is the true reason why I have been so particular in the account of my vast acquired stock ; and how his estate, which was perhaps the product of many years' fortunate industry, and which was equal, if not superior, to mine, at best, was, at my request, kept apart from mine, as is mentioned above.

I have told you how he gave back all my writings into my own hands again. Well, says I, seeing you will have it be kept apart, it shall be so, upon one condition, which I have to propose, and no other. And what is the condition ? says he. Why, says I, all the pretence I can have for the making over my own estate to me is, that in case of your mortality, I may have it reserved for me, if I outlive you. Well, says he, that is true. But then, said I, the annual income is always received by the husband, during his life, as 'tis supposed, for the mutual subsistence of the family ; now, says I, here is 2,000*l.* a year, which I believe is as much as we shall spend, and I desire none of it may be saved ; and all the income of your own estate, the interest of the 17,000*l.* and the 1,320*l.* a year may be constantly laid by for the increase of your estate ; and so, added I, by joining the interest every year to the capital, you will perhaps grow as rich as you would do if you were to trade with it all, if you were obliged to keep house out of it too.

He liked the proposal very well, and said it should be so ; and this way I, in some measure, satisfied myself that I should not bring my husband under the blast of a just Providence, for mingling my cursed ill-gotten wealth with his honest estate. This was occasioned by the reflections which, at some certain intervals of time, came into my thoughts of the justice of heaven, which I had reason to expect would some time or other still fall upon me or my effects, for the dreadful life I had lived.

And let nobody conclude from the strange success I met with in all my wicked doings, and the vast estate which I had raised by it, that therefore I either was happy or easy. No, no, there was a dart struck into the liver ; there was a secret hell within, even all the while, when our joy was at the highest ; but more especially now, after it was all over, and when, according to all appearance, I was one of the happiest women upon earth ; all this while, I say, I had such a constant terror upon my mind, as gave me every now and then very terrible shocks, and which made me expect something very frightful upon every accident of life.

In a word, it never lightened or thundered, but I expected the next flash would penetrate my vitals, and melt the sword [soul] in this scabbard of flesh; it never blew a storm of wind, but I expected the fall of some stack of chimneys, or some part of the house, would bury me in its ruins; and so of other things.

But I shall perhaps have occasion to speak of all these things again by and by; the case before us was in a manner settled; we had full four thousand pounds per annum for our future subsistence, besides a vast sum in jewels and plate; and besides this, I had about eight thousand pounds reserved in money which I kept back from him, to provide for my two daughters, of whom I have yet much to say.

With this estate, settled as you have heard, and with the best husband in the world, I left England again; I had not only, in human prudence, and by the nature of the thing, being now married and settled in so glorious a manner, I say, I had not only abandoned all the gay and wicked course which I had gone through before, but I began to look back upon it with that horror, and that detestation, which is the certain companion, if not the forerunner, of repentance.

Sometimes the wonders of my present circumstances would work upon me, and I should have some raptures upon my soul, upon the subject of my coming so smoothly out of the arms of hell, that I was not ingulfed in ruin, as most who lead such lives are, first or last; but this was a flight too high for me; I was not come to that repentance that is raised from a sense of Heaven's goodness; I repented of the crime, but it was of another and lower kind of repentance, and rather moved by my fears of vengeance, than from a sense of being spared from being punished, and landed safe after a storm.

The first thing which happened after our coming to the Hague (where we lodged for a while) was, that my spouse saluted me one morning with the title of countess, as he said he intended to do, by having the inheritance to which the honour was annexed, made over to him. It is true, it was a reversion, but it soon fell, and in the mean time, as all the brothers of a count are called counts, so I had the title by courtesy, about three years before I had it in reality

I was agreeably surprised at this coming so soon, and would have had my spouse have taken the money which it cost him, out of my stock, but he laughed at me, and went on.

I was now in the height of my glory and prosperity, and I was called the Countess de ———; for I had obtained that unlooked for, which I secretly aimed at, and was really the main reason of my coming abroad. I took now more servants, lived in a kind of magnificence that I had not been acquainted with, was called 'your honour,' at every word, and had a coronet behind my coach; though at the same time I knew little or nothing of my new pedigree.

The first thing that my spouse took upon him to manage, was to declare ourselves married eleven years before our arriving in Holland; and consequently to acknowledge our little son, who was yet in England, to be legitimate; order him to be brought over, and added to his family, and acknowledge him to be our own.

This was done by giving notice to his people at Nimeguen, where his children (which were two sons and a daughter) were brought up, that he was come over from England, and that he was arrived at the Hague with his wife, and should reside there some time, and that he would have his two sons brought down to see him; which accordingly was done, and where I entertained them with all the kindness and tenderness that they could expect from their mother-in-law; and who pretended to be so ever since they were two or three years old.

This, supposing us to have been so long married, was not difficult at all, in a country where we had been seen together about that time, viz., eleven years and a half before, and where we had never been seen afterwards till we now returned together: this being seen together was also openly owned and acknowledged, of course, by our friend the merchant at Rotterdam, and also by the people in the house where we both lodged in the same city, and where our first intimacies began, and who, as it happened, were all alive; and therefore, to make it the more public, we made a tour to Rotterdam again, lodged in the same house, and was visited there by our friend the merchant, and afterwards invited frequently to his house, where he treated us very handsomely.

This conduct of my spouse, and which he managed very cleverly, was indeed a testimony of a wonderful degree of honesty and affection to our little son; for it was done purely for the sake of the child.

I call it an honest affection, because it was from a principle of honesty that he so earnestly concerned himself to prevent the scandal which would otherwise have fallen upon the child, who was itself innocent; and as it was from this principle of justice that he so earnestly solicited me, and conjured me by the natural affections of a mother, to marry him when it was yet young within me and unborn, that the child might not suffer for the sin of its father and mother; so, though at the same time he really loved me very well, yet I had reason to believe that it was from this principle of justice to the child that he came to England again to seek me with design to marry me, and, as he called it, save the innocent lamb from infamy worse than death.

It is with a just reproach to myself that I must repeat it again, that I had not the same concern for it, though it was the child of my own body; nor had I ever the hearty affectionate love to the child that he had. What the reason of it was I cannot tell; and, indeed, I had shown a general neglect of the child through all the gay years of my London revels, except that I sent Amy to look upon it now and then, and to pay for its nursing; as for me, I scarce saw it four times in the first four years of its life, and often wished it would go quietly out of the world; whereas a son which I had by the jeweller, I took a different care of, and showed a differing concern for, though I did not let him know me; for I provided very well for him, had him put out very well to school, and when he came to years fit for it, let him go over with a person of honesty and good business, to the Indies; and after he had lived there some time, and began to act for himself, sent him over the value of 2,000*l.* at several times, with which he traded, and grew rich; and, as 'tis to be hoped, may at last come over again with forty or fifty thousand pounds in his pocket, as many do who have not such encouragement at their beginning.

I also sent him over a wife, a beautiful young lady, well-bred, an exceeding good-natured pleasant creature; but the nice young fellow did not like her, and had the impudence to write to me, that is, to the person I employed to correspond with him, to send him another, and promised that he would marry her I had sent him, to a friend of his, who liked her better than he did ; but I took it so ill, that I would not send him another, and withal, stopped another article of 1,000*l.* which I had appointed to send him. He considered of it afterwards, and offered to take her ; but then truly she took so ill the first affront he put upon her, that she would not have him, and I sent him word I thought she was very much in the right. However, after courting her two years, and some friends interposing, she took him, and made him an excellent wife, as I knew she would, but I never sent him the thousand pounds cargo, so that he lost that money for misusing me, and took the lady at last without it.

My new spouse and I lived a very regular contemplative life ; and, in itself, certainly a life filled with all human felicity. But if I looked upon my present situation with satisfaction, as I certainly did, so, in proportion, I, on all occasions, looked back on former things with detestation, and with the utmost affliction ; and now, indeed, and not till now, those reflections began to prey upon my comforts, and lessen the sweets of my other enjoyments. They might be said to have gnawed a hole in my heart before ; but now they made a hole quite through it : now they eat into all my pleasant things, made bitter every sweet, and mixed my sighs with every smile.

Not all the affluence of a plentiful fortune ; not a hundred thousand pounds' estate (for, between us, we had little less) ; not honour and titles, attendants and equipages ; in a word, not all the things we call pleasure, could give me any relish, or sweeten the taste of things to me ; at least, not so much but I grew sad, heavy, pensive, and melancholy ; slept little, and eat little ; dreamed continually of the most frightful and terrible things imaginable ; nothing but apparitions of devils and monsters, falling into gulfs, and off from steep and high precipices, and the like ; so that in the morning, when I should rise, and be refreshed with the blessing of rest, I was hag-ridden with frights and terrible things formed merely in the imagination, and was either tired and wanted sleep, or overrun with vapours, and not fit for conversing with my family, or any one else.

My husband, the tenderest creature in the world, and particularly so to me, was in great concern for me, and did everything that lay in his power to comfort and restore me; strove to reason me out of it; then tried all the ways possible to divert me: but it was all to no purpose, or to but very little.

My only relief was sometimes to unbosom myself to poor Amy, when she and I was alone; and she did all she could to comfort me: but all was to little effect there; for, though Amy was the better penitent before, when we had been in the storm, Amy was just where she used to be now, a wild, gay, loose wretch, and not much the graver for her age; for Amy was between forty and fifty by this time too.

But to go on with my own story. As I had no comforter, so I had no counsellor; it was well, as I often thought, that I was not a Roman Catholic; for what a piece of work should I have made, to have gone to a priest with such a history as I had to tell him; and what penance would any father confessor have obliged me to perform, especially if he had been honest, and true to his office.

However, as I had none of the recourse, so I had none of the absolution, by which the criminal confessing goes away comforted; but I went about with a heart loaded with crime, and altogether in the dark as to what I was to do; and in this condition I languished near two years. I may well call it languishing, for if Providence had not relieved me, I should have died in little time. But of that hereafter.

I must now go back to another scene, and join it to this end of my story, which will complete all my concern with England, at least all that I shall bring into this account. I have hinted at large what I had done for my two sons, one at Messina, and the other in the Indies.

But I have not gone through the story of my two daughters; I was so in danger of being known by one of them, that I durst not see her, so as to let her know who I was; and for the other, I could not well know how to see her, and own her, and let her see me, because she must then know that I would not let her sister know me, which would look strange; so that, upon the whole, I resolved to see neither of them at all; but Amy managed all that for me; and when she had made gentlewomen of them both, by giving them a good, though late education, she had like to have blown up the whole case, and herself and me too, by an unhappy discovery of herself to the last of them, that is, to her who was our cook-maid, and who, as I said before, Amy had been obliged to turn away, for fear of the very discovery which now happened. I have observed already in what manner Amy managed her by a third person; and how the girl, when she was set up for a lady, as above, came and visited Amy at my lodgings; after which, Amy going, as was her custom, to see the girl's brother (my son) at the honest man's house in Spitalfields, both the girls were there, merely by accident, at the same time; and the other girl unawares discovered the secret, namely, that this was the lady that had done all this for them.

Amy was greatly surprised at it; but as she saw there was no remedy, she made a jest of it, and so after that conversed openly, being still satisfied that neither of them could make much of it, as long as they knew nothing of me. So she took them together one time, and told them the history, as she called it, of their mother, beginning at the miserable carrying them to their aunt's; she owned she was not their mother herself, but described her to them. However, when she said she was not their mother, one of them expressed herself very much surprised, for the girl had taken up a strong fancy that Amy was really her mother, and that she had, for some particular reasons, concealed it from her; and therefore, when she told her frankly that she was not her mother, the girl fell a crying, and Amy had much ado to keep life in her. This was the girl who was at first my cook-maid in the Pall Mall. When Amy had brought her to again a little, and she had recovered her first disorder, Amy asked what ailed her? the poor girl hung about her, and kissed her, and was in such a passion still, though she was a great wench of nineteen or twenty years old, that she could not be brought to speak a great while; at last, having recovered her speech, she said still, But O do not say you a'n't my mother! I'm sure you are my mother; and then the girl cried again like to kill herself. Amy could not tell what to do with her a good while; she was loath to say again she was not her mother, because she would not throw her into a fit of crying again; but she went round about a little with her: Why, child, says she, why would you have me be your mother? If it be because I am so kind to you, be easy, my dear, says Amy; I'll be as kind to you still, as if I was your mother.

Ay, but, says the girl, I am sure you are my mother too; and what have I done that you won't own me, and that you will not be called my mother? though I am poor, you have made me a gentlewoman, says she, and I won't do anything to disgrace you; besides, added she, I can keep a secret too, especially for my own mother, sure; then she calls Amy her dear mother, and hung about her neck again, crying still vehemently.

This last part of the girl's words alarmed Amy, and, as she told me, frightened her terribly; nay, she was so confounded with it, that she was not able to govern herself, or to conceal her disorder from the girl herself, as you shall hear. Amy was at a full stop, and confused to the last degree; and the girl, a sharp jade, turned it upon her. My dear mother, says she, do not be uneasy about it; I know it all; but do not be uneasy, I won't let my sister know a word of it, or my brother either, without you giving me leave; but don't disown me now you have found me; don't hide yourself from me any longer; I can't bear that, says she, it will break my heart.

I think the girl's mad, says Amy; why, child, I tell thee, if I was thy mother I would not disown thee; don't you see I am as kind to you as if I was your mother? Amy might as well have sung a song to a kettledrum, as talk to her. Yes, says the girl, you are very good to me indeed; and that was enough to make anybody believe she was her mother too; but, however, that was not the case, she had other reasons to believe, and to know, that she was her mother; and it was a sad thing she would not let her call her mother, who was her own child.

Amy was so heart-full with the disturbance of it, that she did not enter farther with her into the inquiry, as she would otherwise have done; I mean, as to what made the girl so positive; but comes away, and tells me the whole story.

I was thunderstruck with the story at first, and much more afterwards, as you shall hear; but, I say, I was thunderstruck at first, and amazed, and said to Amy, There must be something or other in it more than we know of; but, having examined farther into it, I found the girl had no notion of anybody but of Amy; and glad I was that I was not concerned in the pretence, and that the girl had no notion of me in it. But even this easiness did not continue long; for the next time Amy went to see her, she was the same thing, and rather more violent with Amy than she was before. Amy endeavoured to pacify her by all the ways imaginable : first, she told her she took it ill that she would not believe her ; and told her, if she would not give over such a foolish whimsey, she would leave her to the wide world as she found her.

This put the girl into fits, and she cried ready to kill herself, and hung about Amy again, like a child. Why, says Amy, why can you not be easy with me, then, and compose yourself, and let me go on to do you good, and show you kindness, as I would do, and as I intend to do ? Can you think that if I was your mother, I would not tell you so ? What whimsey is this that possesses your mind ? says Amy. Well, the girl told her, in a few words (but those few such as frightened Amy out of her wits, and me too), that she knew well enough how it was : I know, says she, when you left — namng the village, where I lived when my father went away from us all, that you went over to France ; I know that too, and who you went with, says the girl ; did not my Lady Roxana come back again with you ? I know it all well enough, though I was but a child, I have heard it all. And thus she run on with such discourse, as put Amy out of all temper again ; and she raved at her like a bedlam, and told her she would never come near her any more ; she might go a begging again if she would ; she'd have nothing to do with her. The girl, a passionate wench, told her she knew the worst of it, she could go to service again, and if she would not own her own child, she must do as she pleased ; then she fell into a passion of crying again, as if she would kill herself.

In short, this girl's conduct terrified Amy to the last degree, and me too ; and was it not that we knew the girl was quite wrong in some things, she was yet so right in some other, that it gave me a great deal of perplexity ; but that which put Amy the most to it, was, that the girl (my daughter) told her, that she (meaning me, her mother) had gone away with the jeweller, and into France too ; she did not call him the jeweller, but with the landlord of the house ; who, after her mother fell into distress, and that Amy had taken all the children from her, made much of her, and afterwards married her.

In short, it was plain the girl had but a broken account of things, but yet that she had received some accounts that had a reality in the bottom of them ; so that, it seems, our first measures, and the amour with the jeweller, were not so concealed as I thought they had been ; and, it seems, came in a broken manner to my sister-in-law, who Amy carried the children to, and she made some bustle, it seems, about it ; but, as good luck was, it was too late, and I was removed and gone, none knew whither, or else she would have sent all the children home to me again, to be sure.

This we picked out of the girls discourse, that is to say, Amy did, at several times ; but it all consisted of broken fragments of stories, such as the girl herself had heard so long ago, that she herself could make very little of it ; only that in the main, that her mother had played the whore ; had gone away with the gentleman that was landlord of the house ; that he married her ; that she went into France. And, as she had learned in my family, where she was a servant, that Mrs. Amy and her Lady Roxana had been in France together, so she put all these things together, and joining them with the great kindness that Amy now showed her, possessed the creature that Amy was really her mother ; nor was it possible for Amy to conquer it for a long time.

But this, after I had searched into it, as far as by Amy's relation I could get an account of it, did not disquiet me half so much as that the young slut had got the name of Roxana by the end, and that she knew who her Lady Roxana was, and the like ; though this, neither, did not hang together, for then she would not have fixed upon Amy for her mother. But some time after, when Amy had almost persuaded her out of it, and that the girl began to be so confounded in her discourses of it, that they made neither head nor tail ; at last the passionate creature flew out in a kind of rage, and said to Amy, that if she was not her mother, Madam Roxana was her mother then, for one of them, she was sure, was her mother ; and then all this that Amy had done for her, was by Madam Roxana's order ; And, I am sure, says she, it was my Lady Roxana's coach that brought the gentlewoman, whoever it was, to my uncle's in Spitalfields ; for the coachman told me so. Amy fell a laughing at her aloud, as was her usual way ; but as Amy told me, it was but on one side of her mouth, for she was so confounded at her discourse, that she was ready to sink into the ground ; and so was I too, when she told it me.

However, Amy brazened her out of it all; told her, Well, since you think you are so high-born as to be my Lady Roxana's daughter, you may go to her and claim your kindred, can't you? I suppose, says Amy, you know where to find her? She said she did not question to find her, for she knew where she was gone to live privately; but, though, she might be removed again, For I know how it is, says she, with a kind of a smile or a grin; I know how it all is, well enough.

Amy was so provoked, that she told me, in short, she began to think it would be absolutely necessary to murder her. That expression filled me with horror, all my blood ran chill in my veins, and a fit of trembling seized me, that I could not speak a good while; at last, What, is the devil in you, Amy? said I. Nay, nay, says she, let it be the devil or not the devil, if I thought she knew one tittle of your history, I would despatch her if she were my own daughter a thousand times. And I, says I in a rage, as well as I love you, would be the first that should put the halter about your neck, and see you hanged with more satisfaction than ever I saw you in my life; nay, says I, you would not live to be hanged, I believe I should cut your throat with my own hand; I am almost ready to do it, said I, as 'tis, for your but naming the thing; with that, I called her cursed devil, and bade her get out of the room.

I think it was the first time that ever I was angry with Amy in all my life; and when all was done, though she was a devilish jade in having such a thought, yet it was all of it the effect of her excess of affection and fidelity to me.

But this thing gave me a terrible shock, for it happened just after I was married, and served to hasten my going over to Holland; for I would not have been seen, so as to be known by the name of Roxana, no, not for ten thousand pounds; it would have been enough to have ruined me to all intents and purposes with my husband, and everybody else too; I might as well have been the German princess.

Well, I set Amy to work; and give Amy her due, she set all her wits to work to find out which way this girl had her knowledge, but, more particularly, how much knowledge she had, that is to say, what she really knew, and what she did not know, for this was the main thing with me; how she could say she knew who Madam Roxana was, and what notions she had of that affair, was very mysterious to me, for it was certain she could not have a right notion of me, because she would have it be that Amy was her mother.

I scolded heartily at Amy for letting the girl ever know her, that is to say, know her in this affair; for that she knew her could not be hid, because she, as I might say, served Amy, or rather under Amy, in my family, as is said before; but she (Amy) talked with her at first by another person, and not by herself; and that secret came out by an accident, as I have said above.

Amy was concerned at it as well as I, but could not help it; and though it gave us great uneasiness, yet, as there was no remedy, we were bound to make as little noise of it as we could, that it might go no farther. I bade Amy punish the girl for it, and she did so, for she parted with her in a huff, and told her she should see she was not her mother, for that she could leave her just where she found her; and seeing she could not be content to be served by the kindness of a friend, but that she would needs make a mother of her, she would, for the future, be neither mother or friend; and so bid her go to service again, and be a drudge as she was before.

The poor girl cried most lamentably, but would not be beaten out of it still; but that which dumbfounded Amy more than all the rest was, that when she had rated the poor girl a long time, and could not beat her out of it, and had, as I have observed, threatened to leave her, the girl kept to what she said before, and put this turn to it again, that she was sure, if Amy wa'n't, my Lady Roxana was her mother, and that she would go find her out; adding, that she made no doubt but she could do it, for she knew where to inquire the name of her new husband.

Amy came home with this piece of news in her mouth to me. I could easily perceive when she came in that she was mad in her mind, and in a rage at something or other, and was in great pain to get it out; for when she came first in, my husband was in the room. However, Amy going up to undress her, I soon made an excuse to follow her, and coming into the room, What the d—l is the matter, Amy? says I; I am sure you have some bad news. News, says Amy, aloud, ay, so I have; I think the d—l is in that young wench, she'll ruin us all and herself too, there's no quieting her. So she went on and told me all the particulars; but sure nothing was so astonished as I was when she told me that the girl knew I was married, that she knew my husband's name, and would endeavour to find me out. I thought I should have sunk down at the very words. In the middle of all my amazement, Amy starts up and runs about the room like a distracted body, I'll put an end to it, that I will, I can't bear it, I must murder her, I'll kill the b——, and swears by her Maker, in the most serious tone in the world, and then repeated it over three or four times, walking to and again in the room; I will, in short, I will kill her, it there was not another wench in the world.

Prithee hold thy tongue, Amy, says I; why, thou art mad. Ay, so I am, says she, stark mad; but I'll be the death of her for all that, and then I shall be sober again. But you sha'n't, says I, you sha'n't hurt a hair of her head; why, you ought to be hanged for what you have done already, for having resolved on it is doing it; as to the guilt of the fact, you are a murderer already, as much as if you had done it already.

I know that, says Amy, and it can be no worse; I'll put you out of your pain, and her too; she shall never challenge you for her mother in this world, whatever she may in the next. Well, well, says I, be quiet, and do not talk thus, I can't bear it. So she grew a little soberer after a while.

I must acknowledge, the notion of being discovered carried with it so many frightful ideas, and hurried my thoughts so much, that I was scarce myself any more than Amy, so dreadful a thing is a load of guilt upon the mind.

And yet when Amy began the second time to talk thus abominably of killing the poor child, of murdering her, and swore by her Maker that she would, so that I began to see that she was in earnest, I was farther terrified a great deal, and it helped to bring me to myself again in other cases.

We laid our heads together then to see if it was possible to discover by what means she had learned to talk so, and how she (I mean my girl) came to know that her mother had married a husband; but it would not do, the girl would acknowledge nothing, and gave but a very imperfect account of things still, being disgusted to the last degree with Amy's leaving her so abruptly as she did.

Well, Amy went to the house where the boy was, but it was all one, there they had only heard a confused story of the lady somebody, they knew not who, which this same wench had told them, but they gave no heed to it at all. Amy told them how foolishly the girl had acted, and how she had carried on the whimsey so far, in spite of all they could say to her; that she had taken it so ill, she would see her no more, and so she might e'en go to service again if she would, for she (Amy) would have nothing to do with her unless she humbled herself and changed her note, and that quickly too.

The good old gentleman, who had been the benefactor to them all, was greatly concerned at it, and the good woman his wife was grieved beyond all expressing, and begged her ladyship (meaning Amy) not to resent it; they promised too, they would talk with her about it, and the old gentlewoman added, with some astonishment, Sure she cannot be such a fool but she will be prevailed with to hold her tongue, when she has it from your own mouth that you are not her mother, and sees that it disobliges your ladyship to have her insist upon it. And so Amy came away with some expectation that it would be stopped here.

But the girl was such a fool for all that, and persisted in it obstinately, notwithstanding all they could say to her; nay, her sister begged and entreated her not to play the fool, for that it would ruin her too, and that the lady (meaning Amy) would abandon them both.

Well, notwithstanding this, she insisted, I say, upon it, and which was worse, the longer it lasted the more she began to drop Amy's ladyship, and would have it that the Lady Roxana was her mother, and that she had made some inquiries about it, and did not doubt but she should find her out.

When it was come to this, and we found there was nothing to be done with the girl, but that she was so obstinately bent upon the search after me, that she ventured to forfeit all she had in view; I say, when I found it was come to this, I began to be more serious in my preparations of my going beyond sea, and particularly, it gave me some reason to fear that there was something in it; but the following accident put me beside all my measures, and struck me into the greatest confusion that ever I was in in my life.

I was so near going abroad that my spouse and I had taken measures for our going off; and because I would be sure not to go too public, but so as to take away all possibility of being seen, I had made some exception to my spouse against going in the ordinary public passage-boats. My pretence to him was the promiscuous crowds in those vessels, want of convenience, and the like; so he took the hint, and found me out an English merchant-ship, which was bound for Rotterdam, and getting soon acquainted with the master, he hired his whole ship, that is to say, his great cabin, for I do not mean his ship for freight, that so we had all the conveniences possible for our passage; and all things being near ready, he brought home the captain one day to dinner with him, that I might see him, and be acquainted a little with him; so we came after dinner to talk of the ship and the conveniences on board, and the captain pressed me earnestly to come on board and see the ship, intimating that he would treat us as well as he could; and in discourse I happened to say I hoped he had no other passengers; he said, No, he had not; but, he said, his wife had courted him a good while to let her go over to Holland with him, for he always used that trade, but he never could think of venturing all he had in one bottom; but if I went with him he thought to take her and her kinswoman along with him this voyage, that they might both wait upon me; and so added, that if we would do him the honour to dine on board the next day, he would bring his wife on board, the better to make us welcome.

Who now could have believed the devil had any snare at the bottom of all this? or that I was in any danger on such an occasion, so remote and out of the way as this was? But the event was the oddest that could be thought of. As it happened, Amy was not at home when we accepted this invitation, and so she was left out of the company; but instead of Amy, we took our honest, good-humoured, never-to-be-omitted friend the Quaker, one of the best creatures that ever lived, sure; and who, besides a thousand good qualities unmixed with one bad one, was particularly excellent for being the best company in the world; though I think I had carried Amy too, if she had not been engaged in this unhappy girl's affair; for on a sudden the girl was lost, and no news was to be heard of her, and Amy had hunted her to every place she could think of, that it was likely to find her in, but all the news she could hear of her was, that she was gone to an old comrade's house of hers, which she called sister, and who was married to a master of a ship who lived at Redriff; and even this the jade never told me. It seems, when this girl was directed by Amy to get her some breeding, go to the boarding-school, and the like, she was recommended to a boarding-school at Camberwell, and there she contracted an acquaintance with a young lady (so they are all called) her bedfellow, that they called sisters, and promised never to break off their acquaintance.

But judge you what an unaccountable surprise I must be in when I came on board the ship and was brought into the captain's cabin, or what they call it, the great cabin of the ship, to see his lady or wife, and another young person with her, who, when I came to see her near hand, was my old cook-maid in the Pall Mall, and, as appeared by the sequel of the story, was neither more or less than my own daughter; that I knew her was out of doubt; for though she had not had opportunity to see me very often, yet I had often seen her, as I must needs, being in my own family so long.

If ever I had need of courage, and a full presence of mind, it was now; it was the only valuable secret in the world to me, all depended upon this occasion; if the girl knew me, I was undone; and to discover any surprise or disorder had been to make her know me, or guess it, and discover herself.

I was once going to feign a swooning and fainting away, and so falling on the ground, or floor, put them all into a hurry and fright, and by that means get an opportunity to be contiually holding something to my nose to smell to, and so hold my hand or my handkerchief, or both, before my mouth; then pretend I could not bear the smell of the ship, or the closeness of the cabin; but that would have been only to remove into a clearer air upon the quarter-deck, where we should, with it, have had a clearer light too; and if I had pretended the smell of the ship, it would have served only to have carried us all on shore to the captain's house, which was hard by; for the ship lay so close to the shore, that we only walked over a plank to go on board, and over another ship which lay within her; so this not appearing feasible, and the thought not being two minutes old, there was no time, for the two ladies rose up, and we saluted, so that I was bound to come so near my girl as to kiss her, which I would not have done had it been possible to have avoided it, but there was no room to escape.

I cannot but take notice here, that notwithstanding there was a secret horror upon my mind, and I was ready to sink when I came close to her to salute her, yet it was a secret inconceivable pleasure to me when I kissed her, to know that I kissed my own child, my own flesh and blood, born of my body, and who I had never kissed since I took the fatal farewell of them all, with a million of tears, and a heart almost dead with grief, when Amy and the good woman took them all away, and went with them to Spitalfields. No pen can describe, no words can express, I say, the strange impression which this thing made upon my spirits; I felt something shoot through my blood, my heart fluttered, my head flashed, and was dizzy, and all within me, as I thought, turned about, and much ado I had not to abandon myself to an excess of passion at the first sight of her, much more when my lips touched her face; I thought I must have taken her in my arms and kissed her again a thousand times, whether I would or no.

But I roused up my judgment, and shook it off, and with infinite uneasiness in my mind, I sat down. You will not wonder, if upon this surprise I was not conversible for some minutes, and that the disorder had almost discovered itself. I had a complication of severe things upon me, I could not conceal my disorder without the utmost difficulty, and yet upon my concealing it depended the whole of my prosperity, so I used all manner of violence with myself to prevent the mischief which was at the door.

Well, I saluted her, but as I went first forward to the captain's lady, who was at the farther end of the cabin, towards the light, I had the occasion offered to stand with my back to the light, when I turned about to her, who stood more on my left hand, so that she had not a fair sight of me, though I was so near her. I trembled, and knew neither what I did or said, I was in the utmost extremity, between so many particular circumstances as lay upon me, for I was to conceal my disorder from everybody at the utmost peril, and at the same time expected everybody would discern it; I was to expect she would discover that she knew me, and yet was, by all means possible, to prevent it. I was to conceal myself, if possible, and yet had not the least room to do anything towards it; in short, there was no retreat, no shifting anything off, no avoiding or preventing her having a full sight of me, nor was there any counterfeiting my voice, for then my husband would have perceived it; in short, there was not the least circumstance that offered me any assistance, or any favourable thing to help me in this exigence.

After I had been upon the rack for near half an hour, during which I appeared stiff and reserved, and a little too formal, my spouse and the captain fell into discourses about the ship and the sea, and business remote from us women; and by and by the captain carried him out upon the quarter-deck, and left us all by ourselves in the great cabin. Then we began to be a little freer one with another, and I began to be a little revived by a sudden fancy of my own, namely, I thought I perceived that the girl did not know me; and the chief reason of my having such a notion was, because I did not perceive the least disorder in her countenance, or the least change in her carriage, no confusion, no hesitation in her discourse; nor, which I had my eye particularly upon, did I observe that she fixed her eyes much upon me, that is to say, not singling me out to look steadily at me, as I thought would have been the case, but that she rather singled out my friend the Quaker, and chatted with her on several things; but I observed too, that it was all about indifferent matters.

This greatly encouraged me, and I began to be a little cheerful: but I was knocked down again as with a thunder-clap, when turning to the captain's wife, and discoursing of me, she said to her, sister, I cannot but think my lady to be very much like such a person; then she named the person, and the captain's wife said she thought so to; the girl replied again, she was sure she had seen me before, but she could not recollect where; I answered (though her speech was not directed to me) that I fancied she had not seen me before in England, but asked if she had lived in Holland; she said, No, no, she had never been out of England; and I added, that she could not then have known me in England, unless it was very lately, for I had lived at Rotterdam a great while. This carried me out of that part of the broil pretty well; and to make it go off better, when a little Dutch boy came into the cabin, who belonged to the captain, and who I easily perceived to be Dutch, I jested and talked Dutch to him, and was merry about the boy, that is to say, as merry as the consternation I was still in would let me be.

However, I began to be thoroughly convinced by this time that the girl did not know me, which was an infinite satisfaction to me; or at least, that though she had some notion of me, yet that she did not think anything about my being who I was, and which, perhaps, she would have been as glad to have known as I would have been surprised if she had; indeed, it was evident that, had she suspected anything of the truth, she would not have been able to have concealed it.

Thus this meeting went off, and, you may be sure, I was resolved, if once I got off of it, she should never see me again, to revive her fancy, but I was mistaken there too, as you shall hear. After we had been on board, the captain's lady carried us home to her house, which was but just on shore, and treated us there again very handsomely, and made us promise that we would come again and see her before we went, to concert our affairs for the voyage, and the like; for she assured us that both she and her sister went the voyage at that time for our company; and I thought to myself, then you'll never go the voyage at all, for I saw from that moment, that it would be no way convenient for my ladyship to go with them; for that frequent conversation might bring me to her mind, and she would certainly claim her kindred to me in a few days, as indeed would have been the case.

It is hardly possible for me to conceive what would have been our part in this affair had my woman Amy gone with me on board this ship; it had certainly blown up the whole affair, and I must for ever after have been this girl's vassal, that is to say, have let her into the secret, and trusted to her keeping it too, or have been exposed and undone. The very thought filled me with horror.

But I was not so unhappy neither, as it fell out, for Amy was not with us, and that was my deliverance indeed; yet we had another chance to get over still. As I resolved to put off the voyage, so I resolved to put off the visit, you may be sure; going upon this principle, namely, that I was fixed in it, that the girl had seen her last of me, and should never see me more.

However, to bring myself well off, and withal to see (if I could) a little farther into the matter, I sent my friend the Quaker to the captain's lady, to make the visit promised, and to make my excuse that I could not possibly wait on her, for that I was very much out of order; and in the end of the discourse I bade her insinuate to them that she was afraid I should not be able to get ready to go the voyage so soon as the captain would be obliged to go, and that perhaps we might put it off to his next voyage. I did not let the Quaker into any other reason for it than that I was indisposed; and not knowing what other face to put upon that part, I made her believe that I thought I was a breeding.

It was easy to put that into her head, and she of course hinted to the captain's lady that she found me so very ill that she was afraid I would miscarry, and then, to be sure, I could not think of going.

She went, and she managed that part very dexterously, as I knew she would, though she knew not a word of the grand reason of my indisposition; but I was all sunk and dead-hearted again, when she told me she could not understand the meaning of one thing in her visit, namely, that the young woman, as she called her, that was with the captain's lady, and who she called sister, was most impertinently inquisitive into things; as who I was? how long I had been in England? where I had lived? and the like; and that, above all the rest, she inquired if I did not live once at the other end of the town.

I thought her inquiries so out of the way, says the honest Quaker, that I gave her not the least satisfaction; but as I saw by thy answers on board the ship, when she talked of thee, that thou didst not incline to let her be acquainted with thee, so I was resolved that she should not be much the wiser for me; and when she asked me if thou ever lived'st here or there, I always said, No: but that thou wast a Dutch lady, and was going home again to thy family and lived abroad.

I thanked her very heartily for that part, and indeed she served me in it more than I let her know she did: in a word she thwarted the girl so cleverly, that if she had known the whole affair she could not have done it better.

But I must acknowledge, all this put me upon the rack again, and I was quite discouraged, not at all doubting but that the jade had a right scent of things, and that she knew and remembered my face, but had artfully concealed her knowledge of me till she might perhaps do it more to my disadvantage. I told all this to Amy, for she was all the relief I had. The poor soul (Amy) was ready to hang herself, that, as she said, she had been the occasion of it all; and that if I was ruined (which was the word I always used to her), she had ruined me; and she tormented herself about it so much, that I was sometimes fain to comfort her and myself too.

What Amy vexed herself at was, chiefly, that she should be surprised so by the girl, as she called her; I mean surprised into a discovery of herself to the girl; which indeed was a false step of Amy's, and so I had often told her, but it was to no purpose to talk of that now, the business was, how to get clear of the girl's suspicions, and of the girl too, for it looked more threatening every day than other; and if I was uneasy at what Amy had told me of her rambling and rattling to her (Amy), I had a thousand times as much reason to be uneasy now, when she had chopped upon me so unhappily as this; and not only had seen my face, but knew too where I lived, what name I went by, and the like.

And I am not come to the worst of it yet neither, for a few days after my friend the Quaker had made her visit, and excused me on the account of indisposition, as if they had done it in over and above kindness, because they had been told I was not well, they come both directly to my lodgings to visit me: the captain's wife and my daughter (who she called sister), and the captain, to show them the place; the captain only brought them to the door, put them in, and went away upon some business.

Had not the kind Quaker, in a lucky moment, come running in before them, they had not only clapped in upon me, in the parlour, as it had been a surprise, but which would have been a thousand times worse, had seen Amy with me; I think if that had happened, I had had no remedy but to take the girl by herself, and have made myself known to her, which would have been all distraction.

But the Quaker, a lucky creature to me, happened to see them come to the door, before they rung the bell, and instead of going to let them in, came running in, with some confusion in her countenance, and told me who was a coming; at which Amy run first and I after her, and bid the Quaker come up as soon as she had let them in.

I was going to bid her deny me, but it came into my thoughts, that having been represented so much out of order, it would have looked very odd; besides, I knew the honest

Quaker, though she would do anything else for me, would not lie for me, and it would have been hard to have desired it of her.

After she had let them in, and brought them into the parlour, she came up to Amy and I, who were hardly out of the fright, and yet were congratulating one another that Amy was not surprised again.

They paid their visit in form, and I received them as formally, but took occasion two or three times to hint that I was so ill that I was afraid I should not be able to go to Holland, at least not so soon as the captain must go off; and made my compliment how sorry I was to be disappointed of the advantage of their company and assistance in the voyage; and sometimes I talked as if I thought I might stay till the captain returned, and would be ready to go again; then the Quaker put in, that then I might be too far gone, meaning with child, that I should not venture at all; and then (as if she should be pleased with it) added, she hoped I would stay and lie in at her house; so as this carried its own face with it, 'twas well enough.

But it was now high time to talk of this to my husband, which, however, was not the greatest difficulty before me; for after this and other chat had taken up some time, the young fool began her tattle again; and two or three times she brought it in, that I was so like a lady that she had the honour to know at the other end of the town, that she could not put that lady out of her mind when I was by, and once or twice I fancied the girl was ready to cry; by and by she was at it again, and at last I plainly saw tears in her eyes; upon which I asked her if the lady was dead, because she seemed to be in some concern for her. She made me much easier by her answer than ever she did before: she said, she did not really know, but she believed she was dead.

This, I say, a little relieved my thoughts, but I was soon down again; for, after some time, the jade began to grow talkative; and as it was plain that she had told all that her head could retain of Roxana, and the days of joy which I had spent at that part of the town, another accident had like to have blown us all up again.

I was in a kind of dishabille when they came, having on a loose robe, like a morning-gown, but much after the Italian way; and I had not altered it when I went up, only dressed my head a little; and as I had been represented as having been lately very ill, so the dress was becoming enough for a chamber.

This morning vest, or robe, call it as you please, was more shaped to the body than we wear them since, showing the body in its true shape, and perhaps a little too plainly if it had been to be worn where any men were to come; but among ourselves it was well enough, especially for hot weather; the colour was green, figured, and the stuff a French damask, very rich.

This gown or vest put the girl's tongue a running again, and her sister, as she called her, prompted it; for as they both admired my vest, and were taken up much about the beauty of the dress, the charming damask, the noble trimming, and the like, my girl puts in a word to the sister (captain's wife), This is just such a thing as I told you, says she, the lady danced in. What, says the captain's wife, the Lady Roxana that you told me of? O! that's a charming story, says she, tell it my lady. I could not avoid saying so too, though from my soul I wished her in heaven for but naming it; nay, I won't say but if she had been carried t'other way it had been much as one to me, if I could but have been rid of her, and her story too, for when she came to describe the Turkish dress, it was impossible but the Quaker, who was a sharp penetrating creature, should receive the impression in a more dangerous manner than the girl, only that indeed she was not so dangerous a person; for if she had known it all, I could more freely have trusted her than I could the girl, by a great deal, nay, I should have been perfectly easy in her.

However, as I have said, her talk made me dreadfully uneasy, and the more when the captain's wife mentioned but the name of Roxana. What my face might do towards betraying me I know not, because I could not see myself, but my heart beat as if it would have jumped out at my mouth, and my passion was so great, that, for want of vent, I thought I should have burst. In a word, I was in a kind of a silent rage, for the force I was under of restraining my passion was such as I never felt the like of. I had no vent, nobody to open myself to, or to make a complaint to, for my relief; I durst not leave the room by any means, for then she would have told all the story in my absence, and I should have been perpetually uneasy to know what she had said, or had not said ; so that, in a word, I was obliged to sit and hear her tell all the story of Roxana, that is to say, of myself, and not know at the same time whether she was in earnest or in jest, whether she knew me or no ; or, in short, whether I was to be exposed, or not exposed.

She began only in general with telling where she lived, what a place she had of it, how gallant a company her lady had always had in the house ; how they used to sit up all night in the house, gaming and dancing ; what a fine lady her mistress was, and what a vast deal of money the upper servants got ; as for her, she said, her whole business was in the next house, so that she got but little, except one night that there was twenty guineas given to be divided among the servants, when, she said, she got two guineas and a half for her share.

She went on, and told them how many servants there was, and how they were ordered ; but, she said, there was one Mrs. Amy, who was over them all ; and that she, being the lady's favourite, got a great deal. She did not know, she said, whether Amy was her christian name or her surname ; but she supposed it was her surname ; that they were told she got three-score pieces of gold at one time, being the same night that the rest of the servants had the twenty guineas divided among them.

I put in at that word, and said it was a vast deal to give away ; Why, says I, it was a portion for a servant. O, madam ! says she, it was nothing to what she got afterwards ; we that were servants hated her heartily for it ; that is to say, we wished it had been our lot in her stead. Then I said again, Why, it was enough to get her a good husband, and settle her for the world, if she had sense to manage it. So it might, to be sure, madam, says she ; for we were told she laid up above 500*l.* ; but, I suppose, Mrs. Amy was too sensible that her character would require a good portion to put her off.

O, said I, if that was the case, it was another thing.

Nay, says she, I don't know, but they talked very much of a young lord that was very great with her.

And pray what came of her at last ? said I ; for I was willing to hear a little (seeing she would talk of it) what she had to say, as well of Amy as of myself.

I don't know, madam, said she, I never heard of her for several years, till t'other day I happened to see her.

Did you indeed, says I, (and made mighty strange of it); what! and in rags, it may be, said I, that's often the end of such creatures.

Just the contrary, madam, says she. She came to visit an acquaintance of mine, little thinking, I suppose, to see me, and, I assure you, she came in her coach.

In her coach! said I; upon my word, she had made her market then; I suppose she made hay while the sun shone; was she married, pray?

I believe she had been married, madam, says she, but it seems she had been at the East Indies; and if she was married, it was there, to be sure. I think she said she had good luck in the Indies.

That is, I suppose, said I, had buried her husband there.

I understand it so, madam, says she, and that she had got his estate.

Was that her good luck? said I; it might be good to her, as to the money indeed, but it was but the part of a jade to call it good luck.

Thus far our discourse of Mrs. Amy went, and no farther, for she knew no more of her; but then the Quaker unhappily, though undesignedly, put in a question, which the honest good-humoured creature would have been far from doing if she had known that I had carried on the discourse of Amy on purpose to drop Roxana out of the conversation.

But I was not to be made easy too soon. The Quaker put in, But I think thou saidst something was behind of thy mistress; what didst thou call her? Roxana, was it not? Pray, what became of her?

Ay, ay, Roxana, says the captain's wife; pray, sister, let's hear the story of Roxana; it will divert my lady, I'm sure.

That's a damn'd lie, said I to myself; if you knew how little 'twould divert me, you would have too much advantage over me; well, I saw no remedy, but the story must come on, so I prepared to hear the worst of it.

Roxana! says she, I know not what to say of her; she was so much above us, and so seldom seen, that we could know little of her but by report; but we did sometimes see her too; she was a charming woman indeed, and the footmen used to say that she was to be sent for to court.

To court, said I; why she was at court, wa'n't she? the Pall Mall is not far from Whitehall.

Yes, madam, says she, but I mean another way.

I understand thee, says the Quaker; thou meanest, I suppose, to be mistress to the king. Yes, madam, says she.

I cannot help confessing what a reserve of pride still was left in me; and though I dreaded the sequel of the story, yet when she talked how handsome and how fine a lady this Roxana was, I could not help being pleased and tickled with it, and put in questions two or three times, of how handsome she was; and was she really so fine a woman as they talked of; and the like, on purpose to hear her repeat what the people's opinion of me was, and how I had behaved.

Indeed, says she, at last, she was a most beautiful creature as ever I saw in my life. But then, said I, you never had the opportunity to see her but when she was set out to the best advantage.

Yes, yes, madam, says she, I have seen her several times in her dishabille. And I can assure you, she was a very fine woman; and that which was more still, everybody said she did not paint.

This was still agreeable to me one way; but there was a devilish sting in the tail of it all, and this last article was one; wherein she said she had seen me several times in my dishabille. This put me in mind that then she must certainly know me, and it would come out at last; which was death to me but to think of.

Well, but sister, says the captain's wife, tell my lady about the ball; that's the best of all the story; and of Roxana's dancing in a fine outlandish dress.

That's one of the brightest parts of her story indeed, says the girl; the case was this: we had balls and meetings in her ladyship's apartments every week almost; but one time my lady invited all the nobles to come such a time, and she would give them a ball; and there was a vast crowd indeed, says she.

I think you said the king was there, sister, didn't you?

No, madam, says she, that was the second time, when they said the king had heard how finely the Turkish lady danced, and that he was there to see her; but the king, if his majesty was there, came disguised.

That is, what they call incog., says my friend the Quaker; thou canst not think the king would disguise himself. Yes, says the girl, it was so; he did not come in public with his guards, but we all knew which was the king well enough, that is to say, which they said was the king.

Well, says the captain's wife, about the Turkish dress; pray let us hear that. Why, says she, my lady sat in a fine little drawing-room, which opened into the great room, and where she received the compliments of the company; and when the dancing began, a great lord, says she, I forget who they called him (but he was a very great lord or duke, I don't know which), took her out, and danced with her; but after a while, my lady on a sudden shut the drawing-room, and run up stairs with her woman, Mrs. Amy; and though she did not stay long (for I suppose she had contrived it all beforehand), she came down dressed in the strangest figure that ever I saw in my life; but it was exceeding fine.

Here she went on to describe the dress, as I have done already; but did it so exactly, that I was surprised at the manner of her telling it; there was not a circumstance of it left out.

I was now under a new perplexity; for this young slut gave so complete an account of everything in the dress, that my friend the Quaker coloured at it, and looked two or three times at me, to see if I did not do so too; for (as she told me afterwards) she immediately perceived it was the same dress that she had seen me have on, as I have said before. However, as she saw I took no notice of it, she kept her thoughts private to herself; and I did so too, as well as I could.

I put in two or three times, that she had a good memory, that could be so particular in every part of such a thing.

O madam! says she, we that were servants, stood by ourselves in a corner, but so as we could see more than some strangers; besides, says she, it was all our conversation for several days in the family, and what one did not observe another did. Why, says I to her, this was no Persian dress; only, I suppose your lady was some French comedian, that is to say, a stage Amazon, that put on a counterfeit dress to please the company, such as they used in the play of Tamerlane, at Paris, or some such.

No, indeed, madam, says she, I assure you my lady was no actress; she was a fine modest lady, fit to be a princess; everybody said, if she was a mistress, she was fit to be a mistress to none but the king; and they talked her up for the king, as if it had really been so. Besides, madam, says she, my lady danced a Turkish dance; all the lords and gentry said it was so; and one of them swore he had seen it danced in Turkey himself, so that it could not come from the theatre at Paris; and then the name Roxana, says she, was a Turkish name.

Well, said I, but that was not your lady's name, I suppose?

No, no, madam, said she, I know that; I know my lady's name and family very well; Roxana was not her name, that's true, indeed.

Here she run me aground again, for I durst not ask her what was Roxana's real name, lest she had really dealt with the devil, and had boldly given my own name in for answer; so that I was still more and more afraid that the girl had really gotten the secret somewhere or other; though I could not imagine neither how that could be.

In a word, I was sick of the discourse, and endeavoured many ways to put an end to it, but it was impossible; for the captain's wife, who called her sister, prompted her, and pressed her to tell it, most ignorantly thinking that it would be a pleasant tale to all of us.

Two or three times the Quaker put in, that this Lady Roxana had a good stock of assurance; and that it was likely, if she had been in Turkey, she had lived with, or been kept by, some great bashaw there. But still she would break in upon all such discourse, and fly out into the most extravagant praises of her mistress, the famed Roxana. I run her down as some scandalous woman; that it was not possible to be otherwise; but she would not hear of it; her lady was a person of such and such qualifications that nothing but an angel was like her, to be sure; and yet, after all she could say, her own account brought her down to this; that, in short, her lady kept little less than a gaming ordinary; or, as it would be called in the times since that, an assembly for gallantry and play.

All this while I was very uneasy, as I said before, and yet the whole story went off again without any discovery, only that I seemed a little concerned that she should liken me to this gay lady, whose character I pretended to run down very much, even upon the foot of her own relation.

But I was not at the end of my mortifications yet, neither; for now my innocent Quaker threw out an unhappy expression, which put me upon the tenters again. Says she to me,

This lady's habit, I fancy, is just such a one as thine, by the description of it ; and then turning to the captain's wife, says she, I fancy my friend has a finer Turkish or Persian dress, a great deal. O ! says the girl, 'tis impossible to be finer ; my lady's, says she, was all covered with gold and diamonds ; her hair and head-dress, I forgot the name they gave it, said she, shone like the stars, there was so many jewels in it.

I never wished my good friend the Quaker out of my company before now ; but, indeed, I would have given some guineas to have been rid of her just now ; for beginning to be curious in the comparing the two dresses, she innocently began a description of mine ; and nothing terrified me so much as the apprehension lest she should importune me to show it, which I was resolved I would never agree to. But before it came to this, she pressed my girl to describe the tyhaia, or head-dress ; which she did so cleverly, that the Quaker could not help saying mine was just such a one ; and after several other similitudes, all very vexatious to me, out comes the kind motion to me to let the ladies see my dress ; and they joined their eager desires of it, even to importunity.

I desired to be excused, though I had little to say at first why I declined it ; but at last it came into my head to say it was packed up with my other clothes that I had least occasion for, in order to be sent on board the captain's ship ; but that if we lived to come to Holland together (which, by the way, I resolved should never happen), then, I told them, at unpacking my clothes, they should see me dressed in it ; but they must not expect I should dance in it like the Lady Roxana, in all her fine things.

This carried it off pretty well ; and getting over this, got over most of the rest, and I began to be easy again ; and, in a word, that I may dismiss the story too, as soon as may be, I got rid at last of my visitors, who I had wished gone two hours sooner than they intended it.

As soon as they were gone, I run up to Amy and gave vent to my passions, by telling her the whole story, and letting her see what mischiefs one false step of hers had like, unluckily, to have involved us all in ; more, perhaps, than we could ever have lived to get through. Amy was sensible of it enough, and was just giving her wrath a vent another way, viz., by calling the poor girl all the damned jades and fools (and sometimes worse names) that she could think of, in the middle of which, up comes my honest good Quaker, and put an end to our discourse. The Quaker came in smiling (for she was always soberly cheerful), Well, says she, thou art delivered at last; I come to joy thee of it; I perceived thou wert tired grievously of thy visitors.

Indeed, says I, so I was; that foolish young girl held us all in a Canterbury story, I thought she would never have done with it. Why, truly, I thought she was very careful to let thee know she was but a cook-maid. Ay, says I, and at a gaming-house, or gaming-ordinary, and at t'other end of the town too; all which (by the way) she might know would add very little to her good name among us citizens.

I can't think, says the Quaker, but she had some other drift in that long discourse; there's something else in her head, says she, I am satisfied of that. Thought I, are you satisfied of it? I am sure I am the less satisfied for that; at least 'tis but small satisfaction to me to hear you say so. What can this be? says I, and when will my uneasiness have an end? But this was silent, and to myself, you may be sure. But in answer to my friend the Quaker, I returned, by asking her a question or two about it; as, what she thought was in it? and why she thought there was anything in it? For, says I, she can have nothing in it relating to me.

Nay, says the kind Quaker, if she had any view towards thee, that's no business of mine; and I should be far from desiring thee to inform me.

This alarmed me again; not that I feared trusting the good-humoured creature with it, if there had been anything of just suspicion in her; but this affair was a secret I cared not to communicate to anybody. However, I say, this alarmed me a little; for as I had concealed everything from her, I was willing to do so still; but as she could not but gather up abundance of things from the girl's discourse, which looked towards me, so she was too penetrating to be put off with such answers as might stop another's mouth. Only there was this double felicity in it, first, that she was not inquisitive to know or find anything out, and not dangerous if she had known the whole story. But, as I say, she could not but gather up several circumstances from the girl's discourse, as particularly the name of Amy, and the several descriptions of the Turkish dress which my friend the Quaker had seen, and taken so much notice of, as I have said above.

As for that, I might have turned it off by jesting with Amy, and asking her who she lived with before she came to live with me? But that would not do, for we had unhappily anticipated that way of talking, by having often talked how long Amy had lived with me; and which was still worse, by having owned formerly that I had had lodgings in the Pall Mall; so that all those things corresponded too well. There was only one thing that helped me out with the Quaker, and that was, the girl's having reported how rich Mrs. Amy was grown, and that she kept her coach. Now, as there might be many more Mrs. Amy's besides mine, so it was not likely to be my Amy, because she was far from such a figure as keeping her coach; and this carried it off from the suspicions which the good friendly Quaker might have in her head.

But as to what she imagined the girl had in her head, there lay more real difficulty in that part a great deal, and I was alarmed at it very much, for my friend the Quaker told me she observed that the girl was in a great passion when she talked of the habit, and more when I had been importuned to show her mine, but declined it. She said she several times perceived her to be in disorder, and to restrain herself with great difficulty; and once or twice she muttered to herself that she had found it out, or that she would find it out, she could not tell whether; and that she often saw tears in her eyes; that when I said my suit of Turkish clothes was put up, but that she should see it when we arrived in Holland, she heard her say softly, she would go over on purpose then.

After she had ended her observations, I added, I observed, too, that the girl talked and looked oddly, and that she was mighty inquisitive; but I could not imagine what it was she aimed at. Aimed at, says the Quaker, 'tis plain to me what she aims at. She believes thou art the same Lady Roxana that danced in the Turkish vest, but she is not certain. Does she believe so? says I; if I had thought that, I would have put her out of her pain. Believe so! says the Quaker, yes; and I began to believe so too, and should have believed so still, if thou had'st not satisfied me to the contrary by thy taking no notice of it, and by what thou hast said since. Should you have believed so? said I, warmly, I am very sorry for that. Why, would you have taken me for an actress, or a French stage-player? No, says the good kind creature, thou carriest it too far; as soon as thou madest thy reflections upon her, I knew it could not be; but who could think any other when she described the Turkish dress which thou hast here, with the head-tire and jewels, and when she named thy maid Amy too, and several other circumstances concurring? I should certainly have believed it, said she, if thou hadst not contradicted it; but as soon as I heard thee speak, I concluded it was otherwise. That was very kind, said I, and I am obliged to you for doing me so much justice; it is more, it seems, than that young talking creature does. Nay, says the Quaker, indeed she does not do thee justice; for she as certainly believes it still, as ever she did. Does she? said I. Ay, says the Quaker, and I warrant thee she'll make thee another visit about it. Will she? says I; then I believe I shall downright affront her. No, thou shalt not affront her, says she (full of her good humour and temper), I'll take that part off thy hands, for I'll affront her for thee, and not let her see thee. I thought that was a very kind offer, but was at a loss how she would be able to do it; and the thought of seeing her there again, half distracted me, not knowing what temper she would come in, much less what manner to receive her in; but my fast friend and constant comforter the Quaker, said she perceived the girl was impertinent, and that I had no inclination to converse with her, and she was resolved I should not be troubled with her. But I shall have occasion to say more of this presently; for this girl went farther yet than I thought she had.

It was now time, as I said before, to take measures with my husband, in order to put off my voyage; so I fell into talk with him one morning, as he was dressing, and while I was in bed; I pretended I was very ill; and as I had but too easy a way to impose upon him, because he so absolutely believed everything I said, so I managed my discourse so as that he should understand by it I was a breeding, though I did not tell him so.

However, I brought it about so handsomely, that, before he went out of the room, he came and sat down by my bed-side, and began to talk very seriously to me upon the subject, of my being so every day ill, and that, as he hoped I was with child, he would have me consider well of it, whether I had not best alter my thoughts of the voyage to Holland; for that being sea-sick, and which was worse, if a storm should happen, might be very dangerous to me. And after saying abundance of the kindest things that the kindest of husbands in the world could say, he concluded, that it was his request to me, that I would not think any more of going till after all should be over ; but that I would, on the contrary, prepare to lie in where I was, and where I knew, as well as he, I could be very well provided, and very well assisted.

This was just what I wanted ; for I had, as you have heard, a thousand good reasons why I should put off the voyage, especially with that creature in company ; but I had a mind the putting it off should be at his motion, not my own ; and he came into it of himself, just as I would have had it. This gave me an opportunity to hang back a little, and to seem as if I was unwilling : I told him, I could not abide to put him to difficulties and perplexities in his business ; that now he had hired the great cabin in the ship, and, perhaps, paid some of the money, and, it may be, taken freight for goods ; and to make him break it all off again would be a needless charge to him, or, perhaps, a damage to the captain.

As to that, he said, it was not to be named, and he would not allow it to be any consideration at all ; that he could easily pacify the captain of the ship by telling him the reason of it, and that if he did make him some satisfaction for the disappointment, it should not be much.

But, my dear, says I, you ha'n't heard me say I am with child, neither can I say so ; and if it should not be so at last, then I shall have made a fine piece of work of it indeed ; besides, says I, the two ladies, the captain's wife and her sister, they depend upon our going over, and have made great preparations, and all in compliment to me ; what must I say to them ?

Well, my dear, says he, if you should not be with child, though I hope you are, yet there is no harm done ; the staying three or four months longer in England will be no damage to me, and we can go when we please, when we are sure you are not with child, or, when it appearing that you are with child, you shall be down and up again ; and as for the captain's wife and sister. leave that part to me ; I'll answer for it there shall be no quarrel raised upon that subject ; I'll make your excuse to them by the captain himself, so all will be well enough there, I'll warrant you.

This was as much as I could desire ; and thus it rested for awhile. I had indeed some anxious thoughts about this impertinent girl, but believed that putting off the voyage would have put an end to it all, so I began to be pretty easy; but I found myself mistaken, for I was brought to the point of destruction by her again, and that in the most unaccountable manner imaginable.

My husband, as he and I had agreed, meeting the captain of the ship, took the freedom to tell him, that he was afraid he must disappoint him, for that something had fallen out which had obliged him to alter his measures, and that his family could not be ready to go time enough for him.

I know the occasion, sir, says the captain; I hear your lady has got a daughter more than she expected; I give you joy of it. What do you mean by that? says my spouse. Nay, nothing, says the captain, but what I hear the women tattle over the tea-table. I know nothing, but that you don't go the voyage upon it, which I am sorry for; but you know your own affairs, added the captain, that's no business of mine.

Well, but, says my husband, I must make you some satisfaction for the disappointment, and so pulls out his money. No, no, says the captain; and so they fell to straining their compliments one upon another; but, in short, my spouse gave him three or four guineas, and made him take it; and so the first discourse went off again, and they had no more of it.

But it did not go off so easily with me; for now, in a word, the clouds began to thicken about me, and I had alarms on every side. My husband told me what the captain had said; but very happily took it, that the captain had brought a tale by halves, and having heard it one way, had told it another; and that neither could he understand the captain, neither did the captain understand himself, so he contented himself to tell me, he said, word for word, as the captain delivered it.

How I kept my husband from discovering my disorder you shall hear presently; but let it suffice to say just now, that if my husband did not understand the captain, nor the captain understand himself, yet I understood them both very well; and, to tell the truth, it was a worse shock than ever I had had yet. Invention supplied me, indeed, with a sudden motion to avoid showing my surprise; for as my spouse and I was sitting by a little table near the fire, I reached out my hand, as if I had intended to take a spoon which lay on the other side, and threw one of the candles off of the table; and then snatching it up, started up upon my feet, and stooped to the lap of my gown, and took it in my hand; O! says I, my gown's spoiled; the candle has greased it prodigiously. This furnished me with an excuse to my spouse to break off the discourse for the present, and call Amy down; and Amy not coming presently, I said to him, My dear, I must run up stairs and put it off, and let Amy clean it a little. So my husband rose up too, and went into a closet where he kept his papers and books, and fetched a book out, and sat down by himself to read.

Glad I was that I had got away, and up I run to Amy, who, as it happened, was alone. O, Amy! says I, we are all utterly undone. And with that, I burst out a crying, and could not speak a word for a great while.

I cannot help saying that some very good reflections offered themselves upon this head; it presently occurred, What a glorious testimony it is to the justice of Providence, and to the concern Providence has in guiding all the affairs of men (even the least as well as the greatest), that the most secret crimes are, by the most unforeseen accidents, brought to light and discovered.

Another reflection was, How just it is that sin and shame follow one another so constantly at the heels; that they are not like attendants only, but, like cause and consequence, necessarily connected one with another; that the crime going before, the scandal is certain to follow; and that 'tis not in the power of human nature to conceal the first, or avoid the last.

What shall I do, Amy? said I, as soon as I could speak, and what will become of me? And then I cried again so vehemently that I could say no more a great while. Amy was frightened almost out of her wits, but knew nothing what the matter was; but she begged to know, and persuaded me to compose myself, and not cry so. Why, madam, if my master should come up now, says she, he will see what a disorder you are in; he will know you have been crying, and then he will want to know the cause of it. With that I broke out again. O, he knows it already, Amy, says I, he knows all! 'Tis all discovered, and we are undone! Amy was thunderstruck now indeed. Nay, says Amy, if that be true, we are undone indeed; but that can never be; that's impossible, I'm sure.

No, no, says I, 'tis far from impossible, for I tell you 'tis so; and by this time, being a little recovered, I told her what discourse my husband and the captain had had together, and what the captain had said. This put Amy into such a hurry, that she cried, she raved, she swore and cursed, like a mad thing; then she upbraided me that I would not let her kill the girl when she would have done it, and that it was all my own doing, and the like. Well, however, I was not for killing the girl yet; I could not bear the thoughts of that neither.

We spent half an hour in these extravagances, and brought nothing out of them neither; for indeed we could do nothing or say nothing that was to the purpose; for if anything was to come out-of-the-way, there was no hindering it, or help for it; so after thus giving a vent to myself by crying, I began to reflect how I had left my spouse below, and what I had pretended to come up for; so I changed my gown that I pretended the candle fell upon, and put on another, and went down.

When I had been down a good while, and found my spouse did not fall into the story again, as I expected, I took heart, and called for it. My dear, said I, the fall of the candle put you out of your history; won't you go on with it? What history? says he. Why, says I, about the captain. Oh, says he, I had done with it; I know no more than that the captain told a broken piece of news that he had heard by halves, and told more by halves than he heard it; namely, of your being with child, and that you could not go the voyage.

I perceived my husband entered not into the thing at all, but took it for a story, which being told two or three times over, was puzzled, and come to nothing; and that all that was meant by it was, what he knew, or thought he knew already, viz., that I was with child, which he wished might be true.

His ignorance was a cordial to my soul, and I cursed them in my thoughts that should ever undeceive him; and as I saw him willing to have the story end there, as not worth being farther mentioned, I closed it too, and said I supposed the captain had it from his wife; she might have found somebody else to make her remarks upon; and so it passed off with my husband well enough, and I was still safe there, where I thought myself in most danger. But I had two uncasinesses still; the first was, lest the captain and my spouse should meet again, and enter into farther discourse about it; and the second was, lest the busy impertinent girl should come again, and when she came, how to prevent her seeing Amy, which was an article as material as any of the rest; for seeing Amy would have been as fatal to me, as her knowing all the rest.

As to the first of these, I knew the captain could not stay in town above a week; but that his ship being already full of goods, and fallen down the river, he must soon follow; so I contrived to carry my husband somewhere out of town for a few days, that they might be sure not to meet.

My greatest concern was where we should go. At last I fixed upon North Hall; not, I said, that I would drink the waters, but that I thought the air was good, and might be for my advantage. He, who did everything upon the foundation of obliging me, readily came into it, and the coach was appointed to be ready the next morning; but as we were settling matters, he put in an ugly word that thwarted all my design; and that was, that he had rather I would stay till afternoon, for that he should speak to the captain next morning, if he could, to give him some letters, which he could do, and be back again about twelve o'clock.

I said, Ay, by all means. But it was but a cheat on him, and my voice and my heart differed; for I resolved, if possible, he should not come near the captain, nor see him, whatever came of it.

In the evening, therefore, a little before we went to bed, I pretended to have altered my mind, and that I would not go to North Hall, but I had a mind to go another way; but I told him I was afraid his business would not permit him; he wanted to know where it was. I told him, smiling, I would not tell him, lest it should oblige him to hinder his business. He answered with the same temper, but with infinitely more sincerity, that he had no business of so much consequence as to hinder him going with me anywhere that I had a mind to go. Yes, says I, you want to speak with the captain before he goes away. Why, that's true, says he, so I do, and paused awhile; and then added, But I'll write a note to a man that does business for me, to go to him; 'tis only to get some bills of loading signed, and he can do it. When I saw

I had gained my point, I seemed to hang back a little. My dear, says I, don't hinder an hour's business for me; I can put it off for a week or two, rather than you shall do yourself any prejudice. No, no, says he, you shall not put it off an hour for me; for I can do my business by proxy with anybody but my wife. And then he took me in his arms and kissed me. How did my blood flush up into my face, when I reflected how sincerely, how affectionately, this good-humoured gentleman embraced the most cursed piece of hypocrisy that ever came into the arms of an honest man! His was all tenderness, all kindness, and the utmost sincerity; mine all grimace and deceit; a piece of mere menage, and framed conduct, to conceal a passed life of wickedness, and prevent his discovering that he had in his arms a she-devil, whose whole conversation for twenty-five years had been black as hell, a complication of crime; and for which, had he been let into it, he must have abhorred me, and the very mention of my name. But there was no help for me in it; all I had to satisfy myself was, that it was my business to be what I was, and conceal what I had been; that all the satisfaction I could make him was to live virtuously for the time to come, not being able to retrieve what had been in time past; and this I resolved upon, though, had the great temptation offered, as it did afterwards, I had reason to question my stability. But of that hereafter.

After my husband had kindly thus given up his measures to mine, we resolved to set out in the morning early. I told him that my project, if he liked it, was to go to Tunbridge; and he, being entirely passive in the thing, agreed to it with the greatest willingness; but said, if I had not named Tunbridge, he would have named Newmarket, there being a great court there, and abundance of fine things to be seen. I offered him another piece of hypocrisy here, for I pretended to be willing to go thither, as the place of his choice, but indeed I would not have gone for a thousand pounds; for the court being there at that time, I durst not run the hazard of being known at a place where there were so many eyes that had seen me before. So that, after some time, I told my husband that I thought Newmarket was so full of people at that time, that we should get no accommodation; that seeing the court and the crowd was no entertainment at all to me, unless as it might be so to him; that if he thought fit, we would rather put it off to another time; and that if, when he went to Holland, we should go by Harwich, we might take a round by Newmarket and Bury, and so come down to Ipswich, and go from thence to the sea-side. He was easily put off from this, as he was from anything else that I did not approve; and so with all imaginable facility he appointed to be ready early in the morning to go with me for Tunbridge.

I had a double design in this, viz., first, to get away my spouse from seeing the captain any more; and secondly, to be out of the way myself, in case this impertinent girl, who was now my plague, should offer to come again, as my friend the Quaker believed she would, and as indeed happened within two or three days afterwards.

Having thus secured my going away the next day, I had nothing to do but to furnish my faithful agent the Quaker with some instructions what to say to this tormentor (for such she proved afterwards), and how to manage her, if she made any more visits than ordinary.

I had a great mind to leave Amy behind too, as an assistant, because she understood so perfectly well what to advise upon any emergence; and Amy importuned me to do so; but I know not what secret impulse prevailed over my thoughts against it; I could not do it for fear the wicked jade should make her away, which my very soul abhorred the thoughts of; which, however, Amy found means to bring to pass afterwards, as I may in time relate more particularly.

It is true I wanted as much to be delivered from her as ever a sick man did from a third-day ague; and had she dropped into the grave by any fair way, as I may call it, I mean, had she died by any ordinary distemper, I should have shed but very few tears for her. But I was not arrived to such a pitch of obstinate wickedness as to commit murder, especially such as to murder my own child, or so much as to harbour a thought so barbarous in my mind. But, as I said, Amy effected all afterwards, without my knowledge, for which I gave her my hearty curse, though I could do little more; for to have fallen upon Amy had been to have murdered myself. But this tragedy requires a longer story than I have room for here. I return to my journey.

My dear friend the Quaker was kind, and yet honest, and would do anything that was just and upright to serve me, but nothing wicked or dishonourable. That she might be able to say boldly to the creature, if she came, she did not know where I was gone, she desired I would not let her know; and to make her ignorance the more absolutely safe to herself, and likewise to me, I allowed her to say that she heard us talk of going to Newmarket, &c. She liked that part, and I left all the rest to her, to act as she thought fit; only charged her, that if the girl entered into the story of the Pall Mall, she should not entertain much talk about it, but let her understand that we all thought she spoke of it a little too particularly; and that the lady (meaning me) took it a little ill to be so likened to a public mistress, or a stage-player, and the like; and so to bring her, if possible, to say no more of it. However, though I did not tell my friend the Quaker how to write to me, or where I was, yet I left a sealed paper with her maid to give her, in which I gave her a direction how to write to Amy, and so, in effect, to myself.

It was but a few days after I was gone, but the impatient girl came to my lodgings on pretence to see how I did, and to hear if I intended to go the voyage, and the like. My trusty agent was at home, and received her coldly at the door; but told her that the lady, which she supposed she meant, was gone from her house.

This was a full stop to all she could say for a good while; but as she stood musing some time at the door, considering what to begin a talk upon, she perceived my friend the Quaker looked a little uneasy, as if she wanted to go in and shut the door, which stung her to the quick; and the wary Quaker had not so much as asked her to come in; for seeing her alone, she expected she would be very impertinent, and concluded that I did not care how coldly she received her.

But she was not to be put off so. She said if the Lady — was not to be spoken with, she desired to speak two or three words with her, meaning my friend, the Quaker. Upon that, the Quaker civilly, but coldly, asked her to walk in, which was what she wanted. Note.—She did not carry her into her best parlour, as formerly, but into a little outer room, where the servants usually waited.

By the first of her discourse she did not stick to insinuate as if she believed I was in the house, but was unwilling to be seen; and pressed earnestly that she might speak but two words with me; to which she added earnest entreaties, and at last tears.

I am sorry, says my good creature, the Quaker, thou hast so ill an opinion of me as to think I would tell thee an untruth, and say that the Lady —— was gone from my house, if she was not! I assure thee I do not use any such method; nor does the Lady —— desire any such kind of service from me, as I know of. If she had been in the house, I should have told thee so.

She said little to that; but said, it was business of the utmost importance that she desired to speak with me about; and then cried again very much.

Thou seem'st to be sorely afflicted, says the Quaker; I wish I could give thee any relief; but if nothing will comfort thee but seeing the Lady ——, it is not in my power.

I hope it is, says she again; to be sure, it is of great consequence to me; so much, that I am undone without it.

Thou troublest me very much to hear thee say so, says the Quaker; but why, then, didst thou not speak to her apart when thou wast here before?

I had no opportunity, says she, to speak to her alone, and I could not do it in company; if I could have spoken but two words to her alone, I would have thrown myself at her foot, and asked her blessing.

I am surprised at thee; I do not understand thee, says the Quaker.

O! says she, stand my friend, if you have any charity, or if you have any compassion for the miserable; for I am utterly undone!

Thou terrifiest me, says the Quaker, with such passionate expressions! for verily I cannot comprehend thee!

O! says she, she is my mother! she is my mother! she does not own me!

Thy mother! says the Quaker; and began to be greatly moved indeed; I am astonished at thee; what dost thou mean?

I mean nothing but what I say, says she; I say again, she is my mother! and will not own me; and with that she stopped with a flood of tears.

Not own thee! says the Quaker; and the tender good creature wept too; why, she says, she does not know thee, and never saw thee before.

No, says the girl, I believe she does not know me, but I know her; and I know that she is my mother.

It's impossible! thou talk'st mystery! says the Quaker; wilt thou explain thyself a little to me?

Yes, yes, says she, I can explain it well enough; I am sure she is my mother, and I have broke my heart to search for her; and now to lose her again, when I was so sure I had found her, will break my heart more effectually.

Well, but if she be thy mother, says the Quaker, how can it be that she should not know thee?

Alas! says she, I have been lost to her ever since I was a child; she has never seen me.

And hast thou never seen her? says the Quaker.

Yes, says she, I have seen her; often enough I saw her; for when she was the Lady Roxana I was her housemaid, being a servant, but I did not know her then, nor she me; but it has all come out since. Has she not a maid named Amy? Note.—The honest Quaker was nonplussed, and greatly surprised at that question.

Truly, says she, the Lady — has several women-servants, but I do not know all their names.

But her woman, her favourite, adds the girl; is not her name Amy?

Why, truly, says the Quaker, with a very happy turn of wit, I do not like to be examined; but lest thou shouldst take up any mistakes by reason of my backwardness to speak, I will answer thee for once, that what her woman's name is I know not; but they call her Cherry.

N.B.—My husband gave her that name in jest, on our wedding-day, and we had called her by it ever after; so that she spoke literally true at that time.

The girl replied very modestly that she was sorry if she gave her any offence in asking; that she did not design to be rude to her, or pretend to examine her; but that she was in such an agony at this disaster that she knew not what she did or said; and that she should be very sorry to disoblige her, but begged of her again, as she was a Christian, and a woman, and had been a mother of children, that she would take pity on her, and, if possible, assist her, so that she might but come to me, and speak a few words to me.

The tender-hearted Quaker told me the girl spoke this with such moving eloquence, that it forced tears from her;

but she was obliged to say that she neither knew where I was gone, or how to write to me; but that if she did ever see me again she would not fail to give me an account of all she had said to her, or that she should yet think fit to say; and to take my answer to it, if I thought fit to give any.

Then the Quaker took the freedom to ask a few particulars about this wonderful story, as she called it; at which the girl, beginning at the first distresses of my life, and indeed of her own, went through all the history of her miserable education, her service under the Lady Roxana, as she called me, and her relief by Mrs. Amy, with the reasons she had to believe that as Amy owned herself to be the same that lived with her mother, and especially that Amy was the Lady Roxana's maid, too, and came out of France with her, she was by those circumstances, and several others in her conversation, as fully convinced that the Lady Roxana was her mother, as she was that the Lady — at her house (the Quaker's) was the very same Roxana that she had been servant to.

My good friend, the Quaker, though terribly shocked at the story, and not well knowing what to say, yet was too much my friend to seem convinced in a thing which she did not know to be true, and which, if it was true, she could see plainly I had a mind should not be known; so she turned her discourse to argue the girl out of it. She insisted upon the slender evidence she had of the fact itself, and the rudeness of claiming so near a relation of one so much above her, and of whose concern in it she had no knowledge, at least no sufficient proof; that as the lady at her house was a person above any disguises, so she could not believe that she would deny her being her daughter, if she was really her mother; that she was able sufficiently to have provided for her if she had not a mind to have her known; and, therefore, seeing she had heard all she had said of the Lady Roxana, and was so far from owning herself to be the person, so she had censured that sham lady as a cheat and a common woman; and that 'twas certain she could never be brought to own a name and character she had so justly exposed.

Beside, she told her that her lodger, meaning me, was not a sham lady, but the real wife of a knight baronet; and that she knew her to be honestly such, and far above such a person as she had described. She then added that she had another reason why it was not very possible to be true, And that is, says she, thy age is in the way; for thou acknowledgest that thou art four-and-twenty years old; and that thou wast the youngest of three of thy mother's children; so that, by thy account, thy mother must be extremely young, or this lady cannot be thy mother; for thou seest, says she, and any one may see, she is but a young woman now, and cannot be supposed to be above forty years old, if she is so much; and is now big with child at her going into the country; so that I cannot give any credit to thy notion of her being thy mother; and if I might counsel thee, it should be to give over that thought, as an improbable story that does but serve to disorder thee, and disturb thy head; for, added she, I perceive thou art much disturbed indeed.

But this was all nothing: she could be satisfied with nothing but seeing me; but the Quaker defended herself very well, and insisted on it that she could not give her any account of me; and finding her still importunate, she affected, at last, being a little disgusted that she should not believe her, and added, that indeed, if she had known where I was gone, she would not have given any one an account of it, unless I had given her orders to do so; But seeing she has not acquainted me, says she, where she has gone, 'tis an intimation to me she was not desirous it should be publicly known; and with this she rose up, which was as plain a desiring her to rise up too, and begone, as could be expressed, except the downright showing her the door.

Well, the girl rejected all this, and told her she could not indeed expect that she (the Quaker) should be affected with the story she had told her, however moving, or that she should take any pity on her. That it was her misfortune, that when she was at the house before, and in the room with me, she did not beg to speak a word with me in private, or throw herself upon the floor at my feet, and claim what the affection of a mother would have done for her; but since she had slipped her opportunity, she would wait for another; that she found by her (the Quaker's) talk, that she had not quite left her lodgings, but was gone into the country, she supposed for the air; and she was resolved she would take so much knight-errantry upon her, that she would visit all the airing-places in the nation, and even all the kingdom over, ay, and Holland too, but she would find me; for she was satisfied she could so convince me that she was my child, that I would not deny it; and she was sure I was so tender and compassionate, I would not let her perish after I was convinced that she was my own flesh and blood; and in saying she would visit all the airing-places in England, she reckoned them all up by name, and began with Tunbridge, the very place I was gone to; then reckoning up Epsom, North Hall, Barnet, Newmarket, Bury, and at last, the Bath; and with this she took her leave.

My faithful agent, the Quaker, failed not to write to me immediately; but as she was a cunning, as well as an honest woman, it presently occurred to her that this was a story which, whether true or false, was not very fit to come to my husband's knowledge; that as she did not know what I might have been, or might have been called in former times, and how far there might have been something or nothing in it, so she thought if it was a secret, I ought to have the telling it myself; and if it was not, it might as well be public afterwards as now; and that, at least, she ought to leave it where she found it, and not hand it forwards to anybody without my consent. These prudent measures were inexpressibly kind, as well as seasonable; for it had been likely enough that her letter might have come publicly to me, and though my husband would not have opened it, yet it would have looked a little odd that I should conceal its contents from him, when I had pretended so much to communicate all my affairs.

In consequence of this wise caution, my good friend only wrote me in few words, that the impertinent young woman had been with her, as she expected she would; and that she thought it would be very convenient that, if I could spare Cherry, I would send her up (meaning Amy), because she found there might be some occasion for her.

As it happened, this letter was inclosed to Amy herself, and not sent by the way I had at first ordered; but it came safe to my hands; and though I was alarmed a little at it, yet I was not acquainted with the danger I was in of an immediate visit from this teasing creature till afterwards; and I run a greater risk, indeed, than ordinary, in that I did not send Amy up under thirteen or fourteen days, believing myself as much concealed at Tunbridge as if I had been at Vienna.

another ~~that~~ — at the concern of my faithful spy (for such my Quaker was now, upon the mere foot of her own sagacity), I say, her concern for me, was my safety in this exigence, when I was, as it were, keeping no guard for myself; for, finding Amy not come up, and that she did not know how soon this wild thing might put her designed ramble in practice, she sent a messenger to the captain's wife's house, where she lodged, to tell her that she wanted to speak with her. She was at the heels of the messenger, and came eager for some news; and hoped, she said, the lady (meaning me), had been come to town.

The Quaker, with as much caution as she was mistress of, not to tell a downright lie, made her believe she expected to hear of me very quickly; and frequently, by the by, speaking of being abroad to take the air, talked of the country about Bury, how pleasant it was, how wholesome, and how fine an air; how the downs about Newmarket were exceeding fine; and what a vast deal of company there was, now the court was there; till at last, the girl began to conclude that my ladyship was gone thither; for, she said, she knew I loved to see a great deal of company.

Nay, says my friend, thou takest me wrong; I did not suggest. says she, that the person thou inquirest after is gone thither, neither do I believe she is, I assure thee. Well, the girl smiled, and let her know that she believed it for all that; so, to clench it fast, Verily, says she, with great seriousness, thou dost not do well, for thou suspectest everything and believest nothing. I speak solemnly to thee that I do not believe they are gone that way; so if thou givest thyself the trouble to go that way, and art dissappointed, do not say that I have deceived thee. She knew well enough that if this did abate her suspicion it would not remove it; and that it would do little more than amuse her; but by this she kept her in suspense till Amy came up, and that was enough.

When Amy came up, she was quite confounded to hear the relation which the Quaker gave her, and found means to acquaint me of it; only letting me know, to my great satisfaction, that she would not come to Tunbridge first; but that she would certainly go to Newmarket or Bury first.

However, it gave me very great uneasiness; for as she resolved to ramble in search after me over the whole country, I was safe nowhere, no, not in Holland itself, so indeed I did not know what to do with her; and thus I had a bitter in all my sweet, for I was continually perplexed with this hussy, and thought she haunted me like an evil spirit.

In the mean time Amy was next door to stark-mad about her; she durst not see her at my lodgings for her life; and she went days without number to Spitalfields, where she used to come, and to her former lodging, and could never meet with her; at length she took up a mad resolution that she would go directly to the captain's house in Redriff, and speak with her; it was a mad step, that's true; but as Amy said she was mad, so nothing she could do could be otherwise. For if Amy had found her at Redriff, she (the girl) would have concluded presently that the Quaker had given her notice, and so that we were all of a knot; and that, in short, all she had said was right. But as it happened, things came to hit better than we expected; for that Amy going out of a coach to take water at Tower Wharf, meets the girl just come on shore, having crossed the water from Redriff. Amy made as if she would have passed by her, though they met so full that she did not pretend she did not see her, for she looked fairly upon her first; but then turning her head away with a slight, offered to go from her; but the girl stopped, and spoke first, and made some manners to her.

Amy spoke coldly to her, and a little angry; and after some words, standing in the street, or passage, the girl saying she seemed to be angry, and would not have spoken to her, Why, says Amy, how can you expect I should have any more to say to you after I had done so much for you, and you have behaved so to me? The girl seemed to take no notice of that now, but answered, I was going to wait on you now. Wait on me! says Amy; What do you mean by that? Why, says she again, with a kind of familiarity, I was going to your lodgings.

Amy was provoked to the last degree at her, and yet she thought it was not her time to resent, because she had a more fatal and wicked design in her head against her; which, indeed, I never knew till after it was executed, nor durst Amy ever communicate it to me; for as I had always expressed myself vehemently against hurting a hair of her head, so she was resolved to take her own measures without consulting me any more.

In order to this, Amy gave her good words, and concealed her resentment as much as she could; and when she talked of going to her lodging, Amy smiled, and said nothing, but called for a pair of oars to go to Greenwich; and asked her, seeing she said she was going to her lodging, to go along with her, for she was going home, and was all alone.

Amy did this with such a stock of assurance that the girl was confounded, and knew not what to say; but the more she hesitated, the more Amy pressed her to go; and talking very kindly to her, told her if she did not go to see her lodgings she might go to keep her company, and she would pay a boat to bring her back again; so, in a word, Amy prevailed on her to go into the boat with her, and carried her down to Greenwich.

'Tis certain that Amy had no more business at Greenwich than I had, nor was she going thither; but we were all hampered to the last degree with the impertinence of this creature; and in particular I was horribly perplexed with it.

As they were in the boat, Amy began to reproach her with ingratitude in treating her so rudely, who had done so much for her, and been so kind to her; and to ask her what she had got by it, or what she expected to get. Then came in my share, the Lady Roxana. Amy jested with that, and bantered her a little; and asked her if she had found her yet.

But Amy was both surprised and enraged when the girl told her roundly that she thanked her for what she had done for her, but that she would not have her think she was so ignorant as not to know that what she [Amy] had done was by her mother's order, and who she was beholden to for it. That she could never make instruments pass for principals, and pay the debt to the agent, when the obligation was all to the original. That she knew well enough who she was, and who she was employed by. That she knew the Lady — very well (naming the name that I now went by), which was my husband's true name, and by which she might know whether she had found out her mother or no.

Amy wished her at the bottom of the Thames; and had there been no watermen in the boat, and nobody in sight, she swore to me she would have thrown her into the river. I was horribly disturbed when she told me this story, and began to think this would, at last, all end in my ruin; but when Amy spoke of throwing her into the river and drowning her,

I was so provoked at her that all my rage turned against Amy, and I fell thoroughly out with her. I had now kept Amy almost thirty years, and found her on all occasions the faithfulest creature to me that ever woman had ; I say, faithful to me ; for, however wicked she was, still she was true to me ; and even this rage of hers was all upon my account, and for fear any mischief should befall me.

But be that how it would, I could not bear the mention of her murdering the poor girl, and it put me so beside myself, that I rose up in a rage, and bade her get out of my sight, and out of my house ; told her I had kept her too long, and that I would never see her face more. I had before told her that she was a murderer, and a bloody-minded creature ; that she could not but know that I could not bear the thought of it, much less the mention of it ; and that it was the impudentest thing that ever was known to make such a proposal to me, when she knew that I was really the mother of this girl, and that she was my own child ; that it was wicked enough in her, but that she must conclude I was ten times wickeder than herself if I could come into it : that the girl was in the right, and I had nothing to blame her for ; but that it was owing to the wickedness of my life that made it necessary for me to keep her from a discovery ; but that I would not murder my child, though I was otherwise to be ruined by it. Amy replied, somewhat rough and short, Would I not ? but she would, she said, if she had an opportunity ; and upon these words it was that I bade her get out of my sight and out of my house ; and it went so far that Amy packed up her alls, and marched off, and was gone for almost good and all. But of that in its order ; I must go back to her relation of the voyage which they made to Greenwich together.

They held on the wrangle all the way by water ; the girl insisted upon her knowing that I was her mother, and told her all the history of my life in the Pall Mall, as well after her being turned away as before ; and of my marriage since ; and which was worse, not only who my present husband was, but where he had lived, viz., at Rouen in France. She knew nothing of Paris, or of where we was going to live, namely, at Nimeguen ; but told her in so many words, that if she could not find me here, she would go to Holland after me.

They landed at Greenwich, and Amy carried her into the park with her, and they walked above two hours there in the farthest and remotest walks ; which Amy did because, as they talked with great heat, it was apparent they were quarrelling, and the people took notice of it.

They walked till they came almost to the wilderness at the south side of the park ; but the girl perceiving Amy offered to go in there among the woods and trees, stopped short there, and would go no farther ; but said she would not go in there.

Amy smiled, and asked her what was the matter ? She replied short, she did not know where she was, nor where she was going to carry her, and she would go no farther ; and without any more ceremony, turns back, and walks apace away from her. Amy owned she was surprised, and came back too, and called to her, upon which the girl stopped, and Amy coming up to her, asked her what she meant ?

The girl boldly replied she did not know but she might murder her ; and that, in short, she would not trust herself with her, and never would come into her company again alone.

It was very provoking, but, however, Amy kept her temper, with much difficulty, and bore it, knowing that much might depend upon it ; so she mocked her foolish jealousy, and told her she need not be uneasy for her, she would do her no harm, and would have done her good, if she would have let her ; but since she was of such a refractory humour, she should not trouble herself, for she should never come into her company again ; and that neither she, or her brother, or sister, should ever hear from her or see her any more ; and so she should have the satisfaction of being the ruin of her brother and sister, as well as of herself.

The girl seemed a little mollified at that, and said that for herself, she knew the worst of it, she could seek her fortune ; but it was hard her brother and sister should suffer on her score ; and said something that was tender and well enough, on that account. But Amy told her it was for her to take that into consideration ; for she would let her see that it was all her own ; that she would have done them all good, but that having been used thus, she would do no more for any of them ; and that she should not need to be afraid to come into her company again, for she would never give her occasion for it any more. This, by the way, was false in the girl, too ; for she did venture into Amy's company again, after that, once too much, as I shall relate by itself.

They grew cooler, however, afterwards, and Amy carried her into a house at Greenwich, where she was acquainted, and took an occasion to leave the girl in a room awhile, to speak to the people in the house, and so prepare them to own her as a lodger in the house; and then going in to her again, told her, there she lodged, if she had a mind to find her out, or if anybody else had anything to say to her. And so Amy dismissed her, and got rid of her again; and finding an empty hackney-coach in the town, came away by land to London, and the girl, going down to the water side, came by boat.

This conversation did not answer Amy's end at all, because it did not secure the girl from pursuing her design of hunting me out; and though my indefatigable friend the Quaker amused her three or four days, yet I had such notice of it at last, that I thought fit to come away from Tunbridge upon it; and where to go I knew not: but, in short, I went to a little village upon Epping Forest, called Woodford, and took lodgings in a private house, where I lived retired about six weeks, till I thought she might be tired of her search, and have given me over.

Here I received an account from my trusty Quaker that the wench had really been at Tunbridge, had found out my lodgings, and had told her tale there in a most dismal tone; that she had followed us, as she thought, to London; but the Quaker had answered her, that she knew nothing of it, which was indeed true; and had admonished her to be easy, and not hunt after people of such fashion as we were, as if we were thieves; that she might be assured, that since I was not willing to see her, I would not be forced to it; and treating me thus would effectually disoblige me. And with such discourses as these she quieted her; and she (the Quaker) added, that she hoped I should not be troubled much more with her.

It was in this time that Amy gave me the history of her Greenwich voyage, when she spoke of drowning and killing the girl in so serious a manner, and with such an apparent resolution of doing it, that, as I said, put me in a rage with her, so that I effectually turned her away from me, as I have said above, and she was gone; nor did she so much as tell me whither, or which way she was gone; on the other hand, when I came to reflect on it, that now I had neither assistant or confidant to speak to, or receive the least information from, my friend the Quaker excepted, it made me very uneasy.

I waited, and expected, and wondered, from day to day, still thinking Amy would one time or other think a little, and come again, or at least let me hear of her; but for ten days together I heard nothing of her. I was so impatient, that I got neither rest by day or sleep by night, and what to do I knew not. I durst not go to town to the Quaker's, for fear of meeting that vexatious creature, my girl, and I could get no intelligence where I was; so I got my spouse, upon pretence of wanting her company, to take the coach one day and fetch my good Quaker to me.

When I had her, I durst ask her no questions, nor hardly knew which end of the business to begin to talk of; but of her own accord, she told me that the girl had been three or four times haunting her for news from me; and that she had been so troublesome, that she had been obliged to show herself a little angry with her; and at last, told her plainly that she need give herself no trouble in searching after me by her means, for she (the Quaker) would not tell her, if she knew; upon which she refrained awhile. But on the other hand, she told me it was not safe for me to send my own coach for her to come in, for she had some reason to believe that she (my daughter) watched her door night and day; nay, and watched her, too, every time she went in and out; for she was so bent upon a discovery, that she spared no pains, and she believed she had taken a lodging very near their house for that purpose.

I could hardly give her a hearing of all this, for my eagerness to ask for Amy; but I was confounded when she told me she had heard nothing of her. It is impossible to express the anxious thoughts that rolled about in my mind, and continually perplexed me about her; particularly, I reproached myself with my rashness in turning away so faithful a creature, that for so many years had not only been a servant but an agent; and not only an agent, but a friend, and a faithful friend too.

Then I considered, too, that Amy knew all the secret history of my life; had been in all the intrigues of it, and been a party in both evil and good; and at best, there was no policy in it; that as it was very ungenerous and unkind to run things to such an extremity with her, and for an occasion, too, in which all the fault she was guilty of was owing to her excessive care for my safety, so it must be only her steady kindness to me, and an excess of generous friendship for me, that should keep her from ill-using me in return for it; which ill-using me was enough in her power, and might be my utter undoing.

These thoughts perplexed me exceedingly, and what course to take I really did not know. I began indeed to give Amy quite over, for she had now been gone above a fortnight; and as she had taken away all her clothes, and her money too, which was not a little, and so had no occasion of that kind to come any more, so she had not left any word where she was gone, or to which part of the world I might send to hear of her.

And I was troubled on another account too, viz., that my spouse and I too had resolved to do very handsomely for Amy, without considering what she might have got another way at all; but we had said nothing of it to her, and so I thought, as she had not known what was likely to fall in her way, she had not the influence of that expectation to make her come back.

Upon the whole, the perplexity of this girl, who hunted me as if, like a hound, she had had a hot scent, but was now at a fault; I say, that perplexity, and this other part, of Amy being gone, issued in this, I resolved to be gone, and go over to Holland; there, I believed, I should be at rest. So I took occasion one day to tell my spouse, that I was afraid he might take it ill that I had amused him thus long, and that, at last, I doubted I was not with child; and that, since it was so, our things being packed up, and all in order for going to Holland, I would go away now, when he pleased.

My spouse, who was perfectly easy, whether in going or staying, left it all entirely to me; so I considered of it, and began to prepare again for my voyage. But alas! I was irresolute to the last degree. I was, for want of Amy, destitute; I had lost my right hand; she was my steward, gathered in my rents (I mean my interest money), and kept my accounts; and, in a word, did all my business; and without her, indeed, I knew not how to go away, nor how to stay. But an accident thrust itself in here, and that even in Amy's conduct, too, which frightened me away, and without her, too, in the utmost horror and confusion.

I have related how my faithful friend the Quaker was come to me, and what account she gave me of her being continually haunted by my daughter; and that, as she said, she watched her very door night and day. The truth was, she had set a spy to watch so effectually, that she (the Quaker) neither went in or out but she had notice of it.

This was too evident, when the next morning after she came to me (for I kept her all night), to my unspeakable surprise, I saw a hackney-coach stop at the door where I lodged, and saw her (my daughter) in the coach all alone. It was a very good chance, in the middle of a bad one, that my husband had taken out the coach that very morning, and was gone to London. As for me, I had neither life or soul left in me; I was so confounded, I knew not what to do or to say.

My happy visitor had more presence of mind than I, and asked me if I had made no acquaintance among the neighbours. I told her yes, there was a lady lodged two doors off that I was very intimate with. But hast thou no way out backward to go to her? says she. Now it happened there was a back-door in the garden, by which we usually went and came to and from the house, so I told her of it. Well, well, says she, go out and make a visit then, and leave the rest to me. Away I run, told the lady (for I was very free there) that I was a widow to-day, my spouse being gone to London, so I came not to visit her, but to dwell with her that day; because, also, our landlady had got strangers come from London. So having framed this orderly lie, I pulled some work out of my pocket, and added, I did not come to be idle.

As I went out one way, my friend the Quaker went the other to receive this unwelcome guest. The girl made but little ceremony, but having bid the coachman ring at the gate, gets down out of the coach, and comes to the door; a country girl going to the door (belonging to the house), for the Quaker forbid any of my maids going. Madam asked for my Quaker by name, and the girl asked her to walk in.

Upon this, my Quaker, seeing there was no hanging back, goes to her immediately, but put all the gravity upon her countenance that she was mistress of, and that was not a little indeed.

When she (the Quaker) came into the room (for they had showed my daughter into a little parlour) she kept her grave countenance, but said not a word; nor did my daughter speak a good while; but after some time, my girl began, and said, I suppose you know me, madam?

Yes, says the Quaker, I know thee, And so the dialogue went on.

GIRL. Then you know my business too?

QUAKER. No, verily, I do not know any business thou canst have here with me.

GIRL. Indeed, my business is not chiefly with you.

QU. Why, then, dost thou come after me thus far?

GIRL. You know who I seek [And with that she cried].

QU. But why shouldst thou follow me for her, since thou know'st that I assured thee more than once that I knew not where she was?

GIRL. But I hoped you could.

QU. Then thou must hope that I did not speak the truth, which would be very wicked.

GIRL. I doubt not but she is in this house.

QU. If those be thy thoughts, thou may'st inquire in the house; so thou hast no more business with me. Farewell! [Offers to go.]

GIRL. I would not be uncivil; I beg you to let me see her.

QU. I am here to visit some of my friends, and I think thou art not very civil in following me hither.

GIRL. I came in hopes of a discovery in my great affair which you know of.

QU. Thou cam'st wildly, indeed; I counsel thee to go back again, and be easy; I shall keep my word with thee, that I would not meddle in it, or give thee any account, if I knew it, unless I had her orders.

GIRL. If you knew my distress, you could not be so cruel.

QU. Thou hast told me all thy story, and I think it might be more cruelty to tell thee than not to tell thee; for I understand she is resolved not to see thee, and declares she is not thy mother. Will'st thou be owned where thou hast no relation?

GIRL. O, if I could but speak to her, I would prove my relation to her so that she could not deny it any longer.

QU. Well, but thou canst not come to speak with her, it seems.

GIRL. I hope you will tell me if she is here. I had a good account that you were come out to see her, and that she sent for you.

QU. I much wonder how thou couldst have such an account. If I had come out to see her, thou hast happened to miss the house, for I assure thee she is not to be found in this house.

Here the girl importuned her again with the utmost earnestness, and cried bitterly, insomuch that my poor Quaker was softened with it, and began to persuade me to consider of it, and, if it might consist with my affairs, to see her, and hear what she had to say; but this was afterwards. I return to the discourse.

The Quaker was perplexed with her a long time; she talked of sending back the coach, and lying in the town all night. This, my friend knew would be very uneasy to me, but she durst not speak a word against it; but on a sudden thought, she offered a bold stroke, which, though dangerous if it had happened wrong, had its desired effect.

She told her, that as for dismissing her coach, that was as she pleased, she believed she would not easily get a lodging in the town; but that as she was in a strange place, she would so much befriend her, that she would speak to the people of the house, that if they had room, she might have a lodging there for one night, rather than be forced back to London, before she was free to

This was a cunning though a dangerous step, and it succeeded accordingly, for it amused the creature entirely, and she presently concluded, that really I could not be there then, otherwise she would never have asked her to lie in the house; so she grew cold again presently as to her lodging there, and said, No, since it was so, she would go back that afternoon, but she would come again in two or three days, and search that and all the towns round in an effectual manner, if she stayed a week or two to do it; for in short, if I was in England or Holland, she would find me.

In truth, says the Quaker, thou wilt make me very hurtful to thee, then. Why so? says she. Because wherever I go, thou wilt put thyself to great expense, and the country to a great deal of unnecessary trouble. Not unnecessary, says she. Yes, truly, says the Quaker; it must be unnecessary, because it will be to no purpose. I think I must abide in my own house, to save thee that charge and trouble.

She said little to that, except that, she said, she would give her as little trouble as possible; but she was afraid she should sometimes be uneasy to her, which she hoped she would excuse. My Quaker told her, she would much rather excuse her if she would forbear; for that, if she would believe her, she would assure her she should never get any intelligence of me by her.

That set her into tears again; but after awhile, recovering herself, she told her, perhaps she might be mistaken; and she (the Quaker) should watch herself very narrowly, or she might one time or other get some intelligence from her, whether she would or no; and she was satisfied she had gained some of her by this journey; for that if I was not in the house, I was not far off; and if I did not remove very quickly, she would find me out. Very well, says my Quaker; then if the lady is not willing to see thee, thou givest me notice to tell her, that she may get out of thy way.

She flew out in a rage at that, and told my friend that if she did, a curse would follow her, and her children after her, and denounced such horrid things upon her, as frightened the poor tender-hearted Quaker strangely, and put her more out of temper than ever I saw her before; so that she resolved to go home the next morning, and I, that was ten times more uneasy than she, resolved to follow her, and go to London too; which, however, upon second thoughts, I did not, but took effectual measures not to be seen or owned, if she came any more; but I heard no more of her for some time.

I stayed there about a fortnight, and in all that time I heard no more of her, or of my Quaker about her; but after about two days more, I had a letter from my Quaker, intimating that she had something of moment to say, that she could not communicate by a letter, but wished I would give myself the trouble to come up, directing me to come with the coach into Goodman's-fields, and then walk to her back-door on foot, which being left open on purpose, the watchful lady, if she had any spies, could not well see me.

My thoughts had for so long time been kept, as it were, waking, that almost everything gave me the alarm, and this especially, so that I was very uneasy; but I could not bring matters to bear to make my coming to London so clear to my husband as I would have done; for he liked the place, and had a mind, he said, to stay a little longer, if it was not against my inclination; so I wrote my friend the Quaker word that I could not come to town yet; and that, besides, I could not think of being there under spies, and afraid to look out of doors ; and so, in short, I put off going for near a fortnight more.

At the end of that time she wrote again, in which she told me that she had not lately seen the impertinent visitor, which had been so troublesome ; but that she had seen my trusty agent Amy, who told her she had cried for six weeks without intermission ; that Amy had given her an account how troublesome the creature had been, and to what straits and perplexities I was driven by her hunting after and following me from place to place ; upon which Amy had said, that notwithstanding I was angry with her, and had used her so hardly for saying something about her of the same kind, yet there was an absolute necessity of securing her, and removing her out of the way ; and that, in short, without asking my leave, or anybody's leave, she would take care she should trouble her mistress (meaning me) no more ; and that after Amy had said so, she had indeed never heard any more of the girl ; so that she supposed Amy had managed it so well as to put an end to it.

The innocent well-meaning creature, my Quaker, who was all kindness and goodness in herself, and particularly to me, saw nothing in this ; but she thought Amy had found some way to persuade her to be quiet and easy, and to give over teasing and following me, and rejoiced in it for my sake ; as she thought nothing of any evil herself, so she suspected none in anybody else, and was exceeding glad of having such good news to write to me ; but my thoughts of it run otherwise.

I was struck, as with a blast from heaven, at the reading her letter ; I fell into a fit of trembling from head to foot, and I ran raving about the room like a mad woman ; I had nobody to speak a word to, to give vent to my passion ; nor did I speak a word for a good while, till after it had almost overcome me. I threw myself on the bed, and cried out, Lord, be merciful to me, she has murdered my child ! and with that a flood of tears burst out, and I cried vehemently for above an hour.

My husband was very happily gone out a hunting, so that I had the opportunity of being alone, and to give my passions some vent, by which I a little recovered myself. But after my crying was over, then I fell in a new rage at Amy ; I called her a thousand devils, and monsters, and hard-hearted tigers; I reproached her with her knowing that I abhorred it, and had let her know it sufficiently, in that I had, as it were, kicked her out of doors, after so many year's friendship and service, only for naming it to me.

Well, after some time, my spouse came in from his sport; and I put on the best looks I could to deceive him; but he did not take so little notice of me as not to see I had been crying, and that something troubled me, and he pressed me to tell him. I seemed to bring it out with reluctance, but told him my backwardness was more because I was ashamed that such a trifle should have any effect upon me, than for any weight that was in it; so I told him I had been vexing myself about my woman Amy's not coming again; that she might have known me better than not to believe I should have been friends with her again, and the like; and that, in short, I had lost the best servant by my rashness that ever woman had.

Well, well, says he, if that be all your grief, I hope you will soon shake it off; I'll warrant you in a little while we shall hear of Mrs. Amy again. And so it went off for that time. But it did not go off with me; for I was uneasy and terrified to the last degree, and wanted to get some farther account of the thing. So I went away to my sure and certain comforter, the Quaker, and there I had the whole story of it; and the good innocent Quaker gave me joy of my being rid of such an unsufferable tormentor.

Rid of her! Ay, says I, if I was rid of her fairly and honourably; but I don't know what Amy may have done. Sure, she ha'n't made her away? Oh fie! says my Quaker; how canst thou entertain such a notion? No, no; made her away! Amy didn't talk like that; I dare say thou may'st be easy in that; Amy has nothing of that in her head, I dare say, says she; and so threw it, as it were, out of my thoughts.

But it would not do; it run in my head continually; night and day I could think of nothing else; and it fixed such a horror of the fact upon my spirits, and such a detestation of Amy, who I looked upon as the murderer, that, as for her, I believe if I could have seen her I should certainly have sent her to Newgate, or to a worse place, upon suspicion; indeed, I think I could have killed her with my own hands.

As for the poor girl herself, she was ever before my eyes;

I saw her by night and by day; she haunted my imagination, if she did not haunt the house; my fancy showed her me in a hundred shapes and postures; sleeping or waking, she was with me. Sometimes I thought I saw her with her throat cut; sometimes with her head cut, and her brains knocked out; other times hanged up upon a beam; another time drowned in the great pond at Camberwell. And all these appearances were terrifying to the last degree; and that which was still worse, I could really hear nothing of her; I sent to the captain's wife in Redriff, and she answered me, she was gone to her relations in Spitalfields. I sent thither, and they said she was there about three weeks ago, but that she went out in a coach with the gentlewoman that used to be so kind to her, but whither she was gone they knew not, for she had not been there since. I sent back the messenger for a description of the woman she went out with; and they described her so perfectly, that I knew it to be Amy, and none but Amy.

I sent word again that Mrs. Amy, who she went out with, left her in two or three hours, and that they should search for her, for I had a reason to fear she was murdered. This frightened them all intolerably. They believed Amy had carried her to pay her a sum of money, and that somebody had watched her after her having received it, and had robbed and murdered her.

I believed nothing of that part; but I believed, as it was, that whatever was done, Amy had done it; and that, in short, Amy had made her away; and I believed it the more, because Amy came no more near me, but confirmed her guilt by her absence.

Upon the whole, I mourned thus for her for above a month; but finding Amy still come not near me, and that I must put my affairs in a posture that I might go to Holland, I opened all my affairs to my dear trusty friend the Quaker, and placed her, in matters of trust, in the room of Amy; and with a heavy, bleeding heart for my poor girl, I embarked with my spouse, and all our equipage and goods, on board another Holland's trader, not a packet-boat, and went over to Holland, where I arrived, as I have said.

I must put in a caution, however, here, that you must not understand me as if I let my friend the Quaker into any part of the secret history of my former life; nor did I commit the grand reserved article of all to her, viz., that I was really the girl's mother, and the Lady Roxana; there was no need of that part being exposed; and it was always a maxim with me, that secrets should never be opened without evident utility. It could be of no manner of use to me or her to communicate that part to her; besides, she was too honest herself to make it safe to me; for though she loved me very sincerely, and it was plain by many circumstances that she did so, yet she would not lie for me upon occasion, as Amy would, and therefore it was not advisable on any terms to communicate that part; for if the girl, or any one else, should have come to her afterwards, and put it home to her, whether she knew that I was the girl's mother or not, or was the same as the Lady Roxana or not, she either would not have denied it, or would have done it with so ill a grace, such blushing, such hesitations and falterings in her answers, as would have put the matter out of doubt, and betrayed herself and the secret too.

For this reason, I say, I did not discover anything of that kind to her; but I placed her, as I have said, in Amy's stead in the other affairs of receiving money, interests, rents, and the like, and she was as faithful as Amy could be, and as diligent.

But there fell out a great difficulty here, which I knew not how to get over; and this was how to convey the usual supply of provision and money to the uncle and the other sister, who depended, especially the sister, upon the said supply for her support; and indeed, though Amy had said rashly that she would not take any more notice of the sister, and would leave her to perish, as above, yet it was neither in my nature, or Amy's either, much less was it in my design; and therefore I resolved to leave the management of what I had reserved for that work with my faithful Quaker, but how to direct her to manage them was the great difficulty.

Amy had told them in so many words that she was not their mother, but that she was the maid Amy, that carried them to their aunt's; that she and their mother went over to the East Indies to seek their fortune, and that there good things had befallen them, and that their mother was very rich and happy; that she (Amy) had married in the Indies, but being now a widow, and resolving to come over to England, their mother had obliged her to inquire them out, and do for them as she had done; and that now she was resolved to go back to the Indies again; but that she had orders from their mother to do very handsomely by them; and, in a word, told them she had 2,000*l.* apiece for them, upon condition that they proved sober, and married suitably to themselves, and did not throw themselves away upon scoundrels.

The good family in whose care they had been, I had resolved to take more than ordinary notice of; and Amy, by my order, had acquainted them with it, and obliged my daughters to promise to submit to their government, as formerly, and to be ruled by the honest man as by a father and counsellor; and engaged him to treat them as his children; and to oblige him effectually to take care of them, and to make his old age comfortable both to him and his wife, who had been so good to the orphans, I had ordered her to settle the other 2,000*l.*, that is to say, the interest of it, which was 120*l.* a year, upon them, to be theirs for both their lives; but to come to my two daughters after them. This was so just, and was so prudently managed by Amy, that nothing she ever did for me pleased me better. And in this posture, leaving my two daughters with their ancient friend, and so coming away to me (as they thought to the East Indies) she had prepared everything in order to her going over with me to Holland; and in this posture that matter stood when that unhappy girl, who I have said so much of, broke in upon all our measures, as you have heard, and, by an obstinacy never to be conquered or pacified, either with threats or persuasions, pursued her search after me (her mother) as I have said, till she brought me even to the brink of destruction; and would, in all probability, have traced me out at last, if Amy had not, by the violence of her passion, and by a way which I had no knowledge of, and indeed abhorred, put a stop to her, of which I cannot enter into the particulars here.

However, notwithstanding this, I could not think of going away and leaving this work so unfinished as Amy had threatened to do, and for the folly of one child to leave the other to starve, or to stop my determined bounty to the good family I have mentioned. So, in a word, I committed the finishing it all to my faithful friend the Quaker, to whom I communicated as much of the whole story as was needful to empower her to perform what Amy had promised, and to make her talk so much to the purpose, as one employed more remotely than Amy had been, needed to do.

To this purpose she had, first of all, a full possession of the money; and went first to the honest man and his wife, and settled all the matter with them; when she talked of Mrs Amy, she talked of her as one that had been empowered by the mother of the girls in the Indies, but was obliged to go back to the Indies, and had settled all sooner if she had not been hindered by the obstinate humour of the other daughter; that she had left instructions with her for the rest; but that the other had affronted her so much that she was gone away without doing anything for her; and that now, if anything was done, it must be by fresh orders from the East Indies.

I need not say how punctually my new agent acted; but, which was more, she brought the old man and his wife, and my other daughter, several times to her house, by which I had an opportunity, being there only as a lodger, and a stranger, to see my other girl, which I had never done before, since she was a little child.

The day I contrived to see them I was dressed up in a Quaker's habit, and looked so like a Quaker, that it was impossible for them, who had never seen me before, to suppose I had ever been anything else; also my way of talking was suitable enough to it, for I had learned that long before.

I have not time here to take notice what a surprise it was to me to see my child; how it worked upon my affections; with what infinite struggle I mastered a strong inclination that I had to discover myself to her; how the girl was the very counterpart of myself, only much handsomer; and how sweetly and modestly she behaved; how, on that occasion, I resolved to do more for her than I had appointed by Amy, and the like.

It is enough to mention here, that as the settling this affair made way for my going on board, notwithstanding the absence of my old agent Amy; so, however, I left some hints for Amy too, for I did not yet despair of my hearing from her; and that if my good Quaker should ever see her again, she should let her see them; wherein, particularly, ordering her to leave the affair of Spitalfields just as I had done, in the hands of my friend, she should come away to me; upon this condition, nevertheless, that she gave full satisfaction to my friend the Quaker that she had not murdered my child ; for if she had, I told her I would never see her face more. How, notwithstanding this, she came over afterwards, without giving my friend any of that satisfaction, or any account that she intended to come over.

I can say no more now, but that, as above, being arrived in Holland, with my spouse and his son, formerly mentioned, I appeared there with all the splendour and equipage suitable to our new prospect, as I have already observed.

Here, after some few years of flourishing and outwardly happy circumstances, I fell into a dreadful course of calamities, and Amy also ; the very reverse of our former good days ; the blast of heaven seemed to follow the injury done the poor girl by us both, and I was brought so low again, that my repentance seemed to be only the consequence of my misery, as my misery was of my crime.

[The work, as originally published by De Foe, in 1724, ends in this manner. The continuation of Roxana's life, which follows, was first printed in 1745, with a long explanation as to the author. It is impossible at this distance of time to say by whom it was written, but the style certainly bears a strong resemblance to that of De Foe. By permission of the publisher of the Pulteney collection of the works of De Foe, the following is printed from his edition.]

In resolving to go to Holland with my husband, and take possession of the title of countess as soon as possible, I had a view of deceiving my daughter, were she yet alive, and seeking me out ; for it seldom happens that a nobleman, or his lady, are called by their surnames, and as she was a stranger to our noble title, might have inquired at our next door neighbour's for Mr. —, the Dutch merchant, and not have been one jot the wiser for her inquiry ; so one evening, soon after this resolution, as I and my husband were sitting together when supper was over, and talking of several various scenes in life, I told him that, as there was no likelihood of my being with child, as I had some reason to suspect I was some time before, I was ready to go with him to any part of the world, whenever he pleased ; I said, that great part of my things were packed up, and what was not, would not be long about, and that I had little occasion to buy any more clothes, linen, or jewels, whilst I was in England, having a large quantity of the richest and best of everything by me already. On saying these words, he took me in his arms, and told me that he looked on what I had now spoken with so great an emphasis, to be my settled resolution, and the fault should not lie on his side if it miscarried being put in practice.

The next morning he went out to see some merchants, who had received advice of the arrival of some shipping which had been in great danger at sea, and whose insurance had ran very high; and it was this interval that gave me an opportunity of my coming to a final resolution; I now told the Quaker, as she was sitting at work in her parlour, that we should very speedily leave her, and although she daily expected it, yet she was really sorry to hear that we had come to a full determination; she said abundance of fine things to me on the happiness of the life I did then, and was going to live; believing, I suppose, that a countess could not have a foul conscience; but at that very instant, I would have, had it been in my power, resigned husband, estate, title, and all the blessings she fancied I had in the world, only for her real virtue, and the sweet peace of mind, joined to a loving company of children, which she really possessed.

When my husband returned, he asked me at dinner if I persevered in my resolution of leaving England; to which I answered in the affirmative: Well, says he, as all my affairs will not take up a week's time to settle, I will be ready to go from London with you in ten days' time. We fixed upon no particular place or abode, but in general concluded to go to Dover, cross the Channel to Calais, and proceed from thence by easy journeys to Paris, where, after staying about a week, we intended to go through part of France, the Austrian Netherlands, and so on to Amsterdam, Rotterdam, or the Hague, as we were to settle before we went from Paris. As my husband did not care to venture all our fortune in one bottom, so our goods, money, and plate, were consigned to several merchants, who had been his intimates many years, and he took notes of a prodigious value in his pocket, besides what he gave me to take care of during our journey. The last thing to be considered was, how we should go ourselves, and what equipage we should take with us; my thoughts were wholly taken up about it some time; I knew I was going to be a countess, and did not care to appear anything mean before I came to that honour ; but on the other hand, if I left London in any public way, I might possibly hear of inquiries after me on the road, that I had been acquainted with before. At last I said, we would discharge all our servants, except two footmen, who should travel with us to Dover, and one maid to wait on me, that had lived with me only since the retreat of Amy, and she was to go through, if she was willing ; and as to the carriage of us, a coach should be hired for my husband, myself, and maid, and two horses were to be hired for the footmen, who were to return with them to London.

When the Quaker had heard when and how we intended to go, she begged, as there would be a spare seat in the coach, to accompany us as far as Dover, which we both readily consented to ; no woman could be a better companion, neither was there any acquaintance that we loved better, or could show more respect to us.

The morning before we set out, my husband sent for a master coachman to know the price of a handsome coach, with six able horses, to go to Dover ; he inquired how many days we intended to be on the journey ; my husband said he would go but very easy, and chose to be three days on the road ; that they should stay there two days, and be three more returning to London, with a gentlewoman (meaning the Quaker) in it ; the coachman said it would be an eight days' journey, and he would have ten guineas for it. My husband consented to pay him his demand, and he received orders to be ready at the door by seven of the clock the next morning : I was quite prepared to go, having no person to take leave of but the Quaker, and she had desired to see us take the packet-boat at Dover, before we parted with her ; and the last night of my stay in London was spent very agreeably with the Quaker and her family. My husband, who stayed out later than usual, in taking his farewell of several merchants of his acquaintance, came home about eleven o'clock, and drank a glass or two of wine with us before we went to bed.

The next morning, the whole family got up about five o'clock, and I, with my husband's consent, made each of the Quaker's daughters a present of a diamond ring, valued at 20*l.*, and a guinea apiece to all the servants, without exception. We all breakfasted together, and at the hour appointed, the coach and attendants came to the door; this drew several people about it, who were all very inquisitive to know who was going into the country, and what is never forgot on such occasions, all the beggars in the neighbourhood were prepared to give us their benedictions in hopes of an alms. When the coachman had packed up what boxes were designed for our use, we, namely, my husband, the Quaker, myself, and the waiting-maid, all got into the coach, the footmen were mounted on horses behind, and in this manner the coach, after I had given a guinea to one of the Quaker's daughters equally to divide among the beggars at the door, drove away from the house, and I took leave of my lodging in the Minories, as well as of London.

At St. George's church, Southwark, we were met by three gentlemen on horseback, who were merchant's of my husband's acquaintance, and had come out on purpose to go half a day's journey with us; and as they kept talking to us at the coach side, we went a good pace, and were very merry together; we stopped at the best house of entertainment on Shooter's hill.

Here we stopped for about an hour, and drank some wine; and my husband, whose chief study was how to please and divert me, caused me to alight out of the coach; which the gentlemen who accompanied us observing, alighted also. The waiter showed us up stairs into a large room, whose window opened to our view a fine prospect of the river Thames, which here, they say, forms one of the most beautiful meanders. It was within an hour of high water, and such a number of ships coming in under sail quite astonished as well as delighted me, insomuch that I could not help breaking out into such-like expressions, My dear, what a fine sight this is; I never saw the like before! Pray will they get to London this tide? At which the good-natured gentleman smiled, and said, Yes, my dear, why there is London, and as the wind is quite fair for them, some of them will come to an anchor in about half an hour, and all within an hour.

I was so taken up with looking down the river, that, till my husband spoke, I had not once looked up the river; but when I did, and saw London, the Monument, the cathedral church of St. Paul, and the steeples belonging to the several parish churches, I was transported into an ecstasy, and could not refrain from saying, Sure that cannot be the place we are now just come from! it must be farther off, for that looks to be scarce three miles off, and we have been three hours, by my watch, coming from our lodgings in the Minories! No, no, it is not London, it is some other place!

Upon which one of the gentlemen present offered to convince me that the place I saw was London, if I would go up to the top of the house, and view it from the turret. I accepted the offer, and I, my husband, and the three gentlemen, were conducted, by the master of the house, up stairs into the turret. If I was delighted before with my prospect, was now ravished, for I was elevated above the room I was in before, upwards of thirty feet. I seemed a little dizzy, for the turret being a lantern, and giving light all ways, for some time I thought myself suspended in the air; but sitting down, and having eat a mouthful of biscuit, and drank a glass of sack, I soon recovered, and then the gentleman who had undertaken to convince me that the place I was shown was really London, thus began, after having drawn aside one of the windows.

You see, my lady, says the gentleman, the greatest, the finest, the richest, and the most populous city in the world, at least in Europe, as I can assure your ladyship, upon my own knowledge, it deserves the character I have given it. But this, sir, will never convince me that the place you now show me is London, though I have before heard that London deserves the character you have with so much cordiality bestowed upon it. And this I can testify, that London, in every particular you have mentioned, greatly surpasses Paris, which is allowed by all historians and travellers to be the second city in Europe.

Here the gentleman, pulling out his pocket-glass, desired me to look through it, which I did; and then he directed me to look full at St. Paul's, and to make that the centre of my future observation, and thereupon he promised me conviction.

Whilst I took my observation, I sat in a high chair, made for that purpose, with a convenience before you to hold the glass. I soon found the cathedral; and then I could not help saying, I have been several times up to the stone gallery, but not quite so often up to the iron gallery. Then I brought my eye to the monument, and was obliged to confess I knew it to be such. The gentleman then moved the glass, and desired me to look, which doing, I said, I think I see Whitehall and St. James's Park, and I see also two great buildings, like barns, but I do not know what they are. Oh, says the gentleman, they are the Parliament house and Westminster Abbey. They may be so, said I; and continuing looking, I perceived the very house at Kensington, which I had lived in some time; but of that I took no notice; yet I found my colour come, to think what a life of gaiety and wickedness I had lived. The gentleman, perceiving my disorder, said, I am afraid I have tired your ladyship; I will make but one remove, more easterly, and then I believe you will allow the place we see to be London.

He might have saved himself the trouble, for I was thoroughly convinced of my error; but to give myself time to recover, and to hide my confusion, I seemed not yet to be quite convinced. I looked, and the first object that presented itself was Aldgate church, which, though I confess to my shame, I seldom saw the inside of it, yet I was well acquainted with the outside, for many times my friend the Quaker and I had passed and repassed by it when we used to go in the coach to take an airing. I saw the church, or the steeple of the church, so plain, and knew it so well, that I could not help saying, with some earnestness, My dear, I see our church; the church, I mean, belonging to our neighbourhood; I am sure it is Aldgate church. Then I saw the Tower, and all the shipping; and, taking my eye from the glass, I thanked the gentleman for the trouble I had given him, and said to him, that I was fully convinced that the place I saw was London, and that it was the very place we came from that morning.

When we came to Sittingbourne, our servants soon brought us word that although we were at the best inn in the town, yet there was nothing in the larder fit for our dinner. The landlord came in after him, and began to make excuses for his empty cupboard. He told us, withal, that if we would please to stay, he would kill a calf, a sheep, a hog, or anything we had a fancy to. We ordered him to kill a pig and some pigeons, which, with a dish of fish, a cherry pie, and some pastry, made up a tolerable dinner. We made up two pounds ten shillings, for we caused the landlord, his wife, and two daughters, to dine with us, and help us off with our wine.

Our landlady and her two daughters, with a glass or two given to the cook, managed two bottles of white wine. This operated so strong upon one of the young wenches, that my spouse being gone out into the yard, her tongue began to run; and, looking at me, she says to her mother, La! mother, how much like the lady her ladyship is (speaking of me), the young woman who lodged here the other night, and stayed here part of the next day, and then set forward for Canterbury, described. The lady is the same person, I'm sure.

This greatly alarmed me, and made me very uneasy, for I concluded this young woman could be no other than my daughter, who was resolved to find me out, whether I would or no. I desired the girl to describe the young woman she mentioned, which she did, and I was convinced it was my own daughter. I asked in what manner she travelled, and whether she had any company. I was answered that she was on foot, and that she had no company; but that she always travelled from place to place in company; that her method was, when she came into any town, to go to the best inns, and inquire for the lady she sought; and then, when she had satisfied herself that the lady, whom she called her mother, was not to be found in that town or neighbourhood, she then begged the favour of the landlady of the inn where she was, to put her into such a company that she knew, that she might go safe to the next town; that this was the manner of her proceeding at her house, and she believed she had practised it ever since she set out from London; and she hoped to meet with her mother, as she called her, upon the road.

I asked my landlady whether she described our coach and equipage, but she said the young woman did not inquire concerning equipage, but only described a lady, so like your ladyship, that I have often, since I saw your ladyship, took you to be the very person she was looking for.

Amidst the distractions of my mind, this afforded me some comfort, that my daughter was not in the least acquainted with the manner in which we travelled. My husband and the landlord returned, and that put an end to the discourse.

I left this town with a heavy heart, fearing my daughter would infallibly find me out at Canterbury; but, as good luck would have it, she had left that city before we came thither, some time. I was very short in one thing, that I had not asked my landlady at Sittingbourne, how long it was since my daughter was there. But when I came to Canterbury I was very anxious and indefatigable in inquiring after my daughter, and I found that she had been at the inn where we then were, and had inquired for me, as I found by the description the people gave of myself.

Here I learnt my daughter had left Canterbury a week. This pleased me; and I was determined to stay in Canterbury one day, to view the cathedral, and see the antiquities of this metropolis.

As we had sixteen miles to our journey's end that night, for it was near four o'clock before we got into our coach again, the coachman drove with great speed, and at dusk in the evening we entered the west gate of the city, and put up at an inn in High-street (near St. Mary Bredman's church), which generally was filled with the best of company. The anxiety of my mind, on finding myself pursued by this girl, and the fatigue of my journey, had made me much out of order, my head ached, and I had no stomach.

This made my husband (but he knew not the real occasion of my illness) and the Quaker very uneasy, and they did all in their power to persuade me to eat anything I could fancy.

At length the landlady of the inn, who perceived I was more disturbed in my mind than sick, advised me to eat one poached egg, drink a glass of sack, eat a toast, and go to bed, and she warranted, she said, I should be well by the morning. This was immediately done; and I must acknowledge, that the sack and toast, cheered me wonderfully, and I began to take heart again; and my husband would have the coachman in after supper, on purpose to divert me and the honest Quaker, who, poor creature, seemed much more concerned at my misfortune than I was myself.

I went soon to bed, but for fear I should be worse in the night, two maids of the inn were ordered to sit up in an adjoining chamber; the Quaker and my waiting-maid lay in a bed in the same room, and my husband by himself in another apartment.

While my maid was gone down on some necessary business, and likewise to get me some burnt wine, which I was to drink going to bed, or rather when I was just got into bed, the Quaker and I had the following dialogue:

QUAKER. The news thou heardest at Sittingbourne hath disordered thee. I am glad the young woman has been out of this place a week; she went indeed for Dover; and when she comes there and canst not find thee, she may go to Deal, and so miss of thee.

ROXANA. What I most depend upon is, that as we do not travel by any particular name, but the general one of the baronet and his lady, and the girl hath no notion what sort of equipage we travelled with, it was not easy to make a discovery of me, unless she accidentally, in her travels, light upon you (meaning the Quaker) or upon me; either of which must unavoidably blow the secret I had so long laboured to conceal.

QUAKER. As thou intendest to stay here to-morrow, to see the things which thou callest antiquities, and which are more properly named the relics of the Whore of Babylon; suppose thou wert to send Thomas, who at thy command followeth after us, to the place called Dover, to inquire whether such a young woman has been inquiring for thee. He may go out betimes in the morning, and may return by night, for it is but twelve or fourteen miles at farthest thither.

ROXANA. I like thy scheme very well; and I beg the favour of you in the morning, as soon as you are up, to send Tom to Dover, with such instructions as you shall think proper.

After a good night's repose I was well recovered, to the great satisfaction of all that were with me.

The good-natured Quaker, always studious to serve and oblige me, got up about five o'clock in the morning, and going down into the inn yard, met with Tom, gave him his instructions, and he set out for Dover before six o'clock.

As we were at the best inn in the city, so we could readily have whatever we pleased, and whatever the season afforded; but my husband, the most indulgent man that ever breathed, having observed how heartily I ate my dinner at Rochester two days before, ordered the very same bill of fare, and of which I made a heartier meal than I did before. We were very merry, and after we had dined, we went to see the town-house, but as it was near five o'clock I left the Quaker behind me, to receive what intelligence she could get concerning my daughter, from the footman, who was expected to return from Dover at six.

We came to the inn just as it was dark, and then excusing myself to my husband, I immediately run up into my chamber, where I had appointed the Quaker to be against my return. I ran to her with eagerness, and inquired what news from Dover, by Tom, the footman.

She said, Tom had been returned two hours; that he got to Dover that morning between seven and eight, and found, at the inn he put up at, there had been an inquisitive young woman to find out a gentleman that was a Dutch merchant, and a lady who was her mother; that the young woman perfectly well described his lady, that he found that she had visited every public inn in the town; that she said she would go to Deal, and that if she did not find the lady, her mother, there, she would go by the first ship to the Hague, and go from thence, to Amsterdam and Rotterdam, searching all the towns through which she passed in the United Provinces.

This account pleased me very well, especially when I understood that she had been gone from Dover five days. The Quaker comforted me, and said it was lucky this busy creature had passed the road before us, otherwise she might easily have found means to have overtaken us, for, as she observed, the wench had such an artful way of telling her story, that she moved everybody to compassion; and she did not doubt but that if we had been before, as we were behind, she would have got those who would have assisted her with a coach, &c., to have pursued us, and they might have come up with us.

I was of the honest Quaker's sentiments. I grew pretty easy, called Tom, and gave him half a guinea for his diligence; then I and the Quaker went into the parlour to my husband, and, soon after, supper came in, and I ate moderately, and we spent the remainder of the evening, for the clock had then tolled nine, very cheerfully; for my Quaker was so rejoiced at my good fortune, as she called it, that she was very alert, and exceeding good company; and her wit, and she had no small share of it, I thought was better played off than ever I had heard it before.

My husband asked me how I should choose to go on board; I desired him to settle it as he pleased, telling him it was a matter of very great indifference to me, as he was to go with me. That may be true, my dear, says he, but I ask you for a reason or two, which I will lay before you, viz., if we hire a vessel for ourselves, we may set sail when we please, have the liberty of every part of the ship to ourselves, and land at what port, either in Holland or France, we might make choice of. Besides, added he, another reason I mention it to you is, that I know you do not love much company, which, in going into the packet-boat, it is almost impossible to avoid. I own, my dear, said I, your reasons are very good; I have but one thing to say against them, which is, that the packet-boat, by its frequent voyages, must of course be furnished with experienced seamen, who know the seas too well even to run any hazard. (At this juncture the terrible voyage I and Amy made from France to Harwich came so strong in my mind, that I trembled so as to be taken notice of by my husband.) Besides, added I, the landlord may send the master of one of them to you, and I think it may be best to hire the state cabin, as they call it, to ourselves, by which method we shall avoid company, without we have an inclination to associate ourselves with such passengers we may happen to like; and the expense will be much cheaper than hiring a vessel to go the voyage with us alone, and every whit as safe.

The Quaker, who had seriously listened to our discourse, gave it as her opinion that the method I had proposed was by far the safest, quickest, and cheapest. Not, said she, as I think thou wouldest be against any necessary expense, though I am certain thou wouldest not fling thy money away.

Soon after, my husband ordered the landlord to send for one of the masters of the packet-boats, of whom he hired the great cabin, and agreed to sail from thence the next day, if the wind and the tide answered.

The settling our method of going over sea had taken up the time till the dinner was ready, which we being informed of, came out of a chamber we had been in all the morning, to a handsome parlour, where everything was placed suitable to our rank; there was a large old-fashioned service of plate, and a sideboard genteelly set off. The dinner was excellent, and well dressed.

After dinner, we entered into another discourse, which was the hiring of servants to go with us from Dover to Paris; a thing frequently done by travellers; and such are to be met with at every stage inn. Our footmen set out this morning on their return to London, and the Quaker and coach was to go the next day. My new chambermaid, whose name was Isabel, was to go through the journey, on condition of doing no other business than waiting on me. In a while we partly concluded to let the hiring of men-servants alone till we came to Calais, for they could be of no use to us on board a ship, the sailor's or cabin boy's place being to attend the cabin passengers as well as his master.

To divert ourselves, we took a walk after we had dined, round about the town, and coming to the garrison, and being somewhat thirsty, all went into the 'sutler's for a glass of wine. A pint was called for, and brought; but the man of the house came in with it raving like a madman, saying, Don't you think you are a villain, to ask for a pot of ale, when I know you have spent all your money, and are ignorant of the means of getting more, without you hear of a place, which I look upon to be very unlikely? Don't be in such a passion, landlord, said my husband. Pray what is the matter? O, nothing, sir, says he; but a young fellow in the sutling room, whom I find to have been a gentleman's servant, wants a place; and having spent all his money, would willingly run up a score with me, knowing I must get him a master if ever I intend to have my money. Pray sir, said my husband, send the young fellow to me; if I like him, and can agree with him, it is possible I may take him into my service. The landlord took care we should not speak to him twice, he went and fetched him in himself; and my husband examined him before he spoke, as to his size, mien, and garb. The young man was clean dressed, of a middling stature, a dark complexion, and about twenty-seven years old.

I hear, young man, says he to him, that you want a place; it may, perhaps, be in my power to serve you; let me know at once what education you have had, if you have any family belonging to you, or if you are fit for a gentleman's service, can bring any person of reputation to your character, and are willing to go and live in Holland with me: we will not differ about your wages.

The young fellow made a respectful bow to each of us, and addressed himself to my husband as follows: Sir, said he, in me you behold the eldest child of misfortune. I am but young, as you may see; I have no comers after me, and having lived with several gentlemen, some of whom are on their travels, others settled in divers parts of the world, besides what are dead, makes me unable to produce a character without a week's notice to write to London; and I should not doubt but by the return of the post, to let you see some letters as would satisfy you in any doubts about me. My education, continued he, is but very middling, being taken from school before I had well learnt to read, write, and cast accounts; and as to my parentage, I cannot well give you any account of them; all that I know is, that my father was a brewer, and by his extravagance ran out a handsome fortune, and afterwards left my poor mother almost penniless, with five small children, of which I was the second, though not above five years old. My mother knew not what to do with us, so she sent a poor girl, our maid, whose name I have forgot this many years, with us all to a relation's, and there left us; and I never saw or heard of or from them any more; indeed I inquired among the neighbours, and all that I could learn was, that my mother's goods were seized, that she was obliged to apply to the parish for relief, and died of grief soon after. For my part, says he, I was put into the hands of my father's sister, where, by her cruel usage, I was forced to run away at nine years of age; and the numerous scenes of life I have since gone through are more than would fill a small volume. Pray, sir, added he, let it satisfy you that I am thoroughly honest, and should be glad to serve you at any rate; and although I cannot possibly get a good character from anybody at present, yet I defy the whole world to give me an ill one, either in public or private life.

If I had had the eyes of Argus I should have seen with them all on this occasion; I knew that this was my son, and one that, among all my inquiry, I could never get any account of. The Quaker seeing my colour come and go, and also tremble, said, I verily believe thou art not well; I hope this Kentish air, which was always reckoned aguish, does not hurt thee? I am taken very sick of a sudden, said I; so pray let me go to our inn, that I may go to my chamber. Isabel being called in, she and the Quaker attended me there, leaving the young fellow with my spouse. When I was got into my chamber, I was seized with such a grief as I had never known before, and flinging myself down upon the bed, burst into a flood of tears, and soon after fainted away. Soon after, I came a little to myself, and the Quaker begged of me to tell her what was the cause of my sudden indisposition. Nothing at all, says I, as I know of; but a sudden chillness seized my blood, and that, joined to a fainting of the spirits, made me ready to sink.

Presently after, my husband came to see how I did, and finding me somewhat better, he told me that he had a mind to hire the young man I had left him with, for he believed he was honest, and fit for our service. My dear, says I, I did not mind him. I would desire you to be cautious who we pick up on the road; but as I have the satisfaction of hiring my maids, I shall never trouble myself with the men-servants, that is wholly your province. However, added I (for I was very certain he was my son, and was resolved to have him in my service, though it was my interest to keep my husband off, in order to bring him on), if you like the fellow, I am not averse to your hiring one servant in England: we are not obliged to trust him with much, before we see his conduct; and if he does not prove as you may expect, you may turn him off whenever you please. I believe, said my husband, he has been ingenuous in his relation to me; and as a man who has seen great variety of life, and may have been the shuttlecock of fortune, the butt of envy, and the mark of malice, I will hire him when he comes to me here anon, as I have ordered him.

As I knew he was to be hired, I resolved to be out of the way when he came to my husband; so about five o'clock I proposed to the Quaker to take a walk on the pier and see the shipping, while the teakettle was boiling. We went, and took Isabel with us, and as we were going along I saw my son Thomas (as I shall for the future call him) going to our inn; so we stayed out about an hour, and when we returned, my husband told me he had hired the man, and that he was to come to him as a servant on the morrow morning. Pray, my dear, said I, did you ask where he ever lived, or what his name is? Yes, replied my husband, he says his name is Thomas —; and as to places, he has mentioned several families of note, and among others, he lived at my Lord —'s, next door to the great French lady's in Pall Mall, whose name he tells me was Roxana. I was now in a sad dilemma, and was fearful I should be known by my own son; and the Quaker took notice of it, and afterwards told me she believed fortune had conspired that all the people I became acquainted with, should have known the Lady Roxana. I warrant, said she, this young fellow is somewhat acquainted with the impertinent wench that calls herself thy daughter.

I was very uneasy in mind, but had one thing in my favour, which was always to keep myself at a very great distance from my servants; and as the Quaker was to part with us the next day or night, he would have nobody to mention the name Roxana to, and so of course it would drop.

We supped pretty late at night, and were very merry, for my husband said all the pleasant things he could think of, to divert me from the supposed illness he thought I had been troubled with in the day. The Quaker kept up the discourse with great spirit, and I was glad to receive the impression, for I wanted the real illness to be drove out of my head.

The next morning, after breakfast, Thomas came to his new place; he appeared very clean, and brought with him a small bundle, which I supposed to be linen tied up in a handkerchief. My husband sent him to order some porters belonging to the quay to fetch our boxes to the custom-house, where they were searched, for which we paid one shilling; and he had orders to give a crown for head money, as they called it; their demand by custom is but sixpence a head, but we appeared to our circumstances in everything. As soon as our baggage was searched, it was carried from the custom-house on board the packet-boat, and there lodged in the great cabin, as we had ordered it.

This took up the time till dinner, and when we were sitting together after we had both dined, the captain came to tell us that the wind was very fair, and that he was to sail at high water, which would be about ten o'clock at night. My husband asked him to stay and drink part of a bottle of wine with him, which he did; and their discourse being all in the maritime strain, the Quaker and I retired and left them together, for I had something to remind her of in our discourse before we left London. When we got into the garden, which was rather neat than fine, I repeated all my former requests to her about my children, Spitalfields, Amy, &c., and we sat talking together till Thomas was sent to tell us the captain was going, on which we returned; but, by the way, I kissed her and put a large gold medal into her hand, as a token of my sincere love, and desired that she would never neglect the things she had promised to perform, and her repeated promise gave me great satisfaction.

The captain, who was going out of the parlour as we returned in, was telling my husband he would send six of his hands to conduct us to the boat, about a quarter of an hour before he sailed, and as the moon was at the full, he did not doubt of a pleasant passage.

Our next business was to pay off the coachman, to whom my husband gave half a guinea extraordinary, to set the Quaker down at the house he took us all up at, which he promised to perform.

As it was low water, we went on board to see the cabin that we were to go our voyage in, and the captain would detain us to drink a glass of the best punch, I think, I ever tasted.

When we returned to the inn, we ordered supper to be ready by eight o'clock, that we might drink a parting glass to settle it, before we went on board; for my husband, who knew the sea very well, said a full stomach was the forerunner of sea sickness, which I was willing to avoid.

We invited the landlord, his wife, and daughter, to supper with us, and having sat about an hour afterwards, the captain himself, with several sailors, came to fetch us to the vessel. As all was paid, and we had nothing to hinder us, but taking a final leave of the Quaker, who would go to see us safe in the vessel, where tears flowed from both our eyes; and I turned short in the boat, while my husband took his farewell, and he then followed me, and I never saw the Quaker or England any more.

We were no sooner on board than we hoisted sail; the anchors being up, and the wind fair, we cut the waves at a great rate, till about four o'clock in the morning, when a French boat came to fetch the mail to carry it to the post-house, and the boat cast her anchors, for we were a good distance from the shore, neither could we sail to the town till next tide, the present one being too far advanced in the ebb.

We might have gone on shore in the boat that carried the mail, but my husband was sleeping in the cabin when it came to the packet-boat, and I did not care to disturb him; however, we had an opportunity soon after, for my husband awaking, and two other boats coming up with ours to see for passengers, Thomas came to let us know we might go on shore, if we pleased. My husband paid the master of the packet-boat for our passage, and Thomas, with the sailors' assistance, got our boxes into the wherry, so we sailed for Calais, but before our boat came to touch ground, several men, whose bread I suppose it is, rushed into the water, without shoes or stockings, to carry us on shore; so having paid ten shillings for the wherry, we each of us was carried from the boat to the land by two men, and our goods brought after us; here was a crown to be paid, to save ourselves from being wet, by all which a man that is going a travelling may see that it is not the bare expense of the packet-boat that will carry him to Calais.

It would be needless to inform the reader of all the ceremonies that we passed through at this place before we were suffered to proceed on our journey; however, our boxes having been searched at the custom-house, my husband had them plumbed, as they called it, to hinder any farther inquiry about them; and we got them all to the Silver Lion, a noted inn, and the post-house of this place, where we took a stage-coach for ourselves, and the next morning, having well refreshed ourselves, we all, viz., my husband, self, and chamber-maid within the coach, and Thomas behind (besides which, my husband hired two horsemen well armed, who were pretty expensive, to travel with us), set forward on our journey.

We were five days on our journey from Calais to Paris, which we went through with much satisfaction, for, having fine weather and good attendance, we had nothing to hope for.

When we arrived at Paris (I began to be sorry I had ever proposed going to it, for fear of being known, but as we were to stay there but a few days, I was resolved to keep very retired), we went to a merchant's house of my husband's acquaintance in the Rue de la Bourle, near the Carmelites, in the Faubourg de St. Jacques.

This being a remote part of the city, on the south side, and near several pleasant gardens, I thought it would be proper to be a little indisposed, that my husband might not press me to go with him to see the curiosities; for he could do the most needful business, such as going to the bankers to exchange bills, despatching of letters, settling affairs with merchants, &c., without my assistance; and I had a tolerable plea for my conduct, such as the great fatigue of our journey, being among strangers, &c.; so we stayed at Paris eight days without my going to any particular places, except going one day to the gardens of Luxembourg, another to the church of Notre Dame on the Isle of Paris, a third to the Hotel Royale des Invalides, a fourth to the gardens of the Thuilleries, a fifth to the suburbs of St. Lawrence, to see the fair which was then holding there; a sixth to the gardens of the Louvre, a seventh to the play-house, and the eighth stayed all day at home to write a letter to the Quaker, letting her know where I then was, and how soon we should go forwards in our journey, but did not mention where we intended to settle, as indeed we had not yet settled that ourselves.

One of the days, viz., that in which I went to the gardens of the Thuilleries, I asked Thomas several questions about his father, mother, and other relations, being resolved, notwithstanding he was my own son, as he did not know it, to turn him off by some stratagem or another, if he had any manner of memory of me, either as his mother, or the Lady Roxana; I asked him if he had any particular memory of his mother or father; he answered, No, I scarce remember anything of either of them, said he, but I have heard from several people that I had one brother and three sisters, though I never saw them all, to know them, notwithstanding I lived with an aunt four years; I often asked after my mother, and some people said she went away with a man, but it was allowed by most people, that best knew her, that she, being brought to the greatest distress, was carried to the workhouse belonging to the parish, where she died soon after with grief.

Nothing could give me more satisfaction than what Thomas had related; so now, I thought I would ask about the Lady Roxana (for he had been my next-door neighbour when I had that title conferred on me). Pray, Thomas, said I, did not you speak of a great person of quality, whose name I have forgot, that lived next door to my Lord ——'s, when you was his valet? pray who was she, I suppose a foreigner, by the name you called her? Really, my lady, replied he, I do not know who she was; all I can say of her is, that she kept the greatest company, and was a beautiful woman, by report, but I never saw her; she was called the Lady Roxana, was a very good mistress, but her character was not so good as to private life as it ought to be. Though I once had an opportunity, continued he, of seeing a fine outlandish dress she danced in before the king, which I took as a great favour, for her cook took me up when the lady was out, and she desired my lady's woman to show it to me.

All this answered right, and I had nothing to do but to keep my Turkish dress out of the way, to be myself unknown to my child, for as he had never seen Roxana, so he knew nothing of me.

In the interval, my husband had hired a stage-coach to carry us to the city of Menin, where he intended to go by water down the river Lys to Ghent, and there take coach to Isabella fort, opposite the city of Anvers, and cross the river to that place, and go from thence by land to Breda; and as he had agreed and settled this patrole, I was satisfied, and we set out next day. We went through several handsome towns and villages, before we took water, but by water we went round part of the city of Courtray, and several fortified towns. At Anvers we hired a coach to Breda, where we stayed two days to refresh ourselves, for we had been very much fatigued; as Williamstadt was situated so as to be convenient for our taking water for Rotterdam, we went there, and being shipped, had a safe and speedy voyage to that city.

As we had resolved in our journey to settle at the Hague, we did not intend to stay any longer at Rotterdam, than while my husband had all our wealth delivered to him from the several merchants he had consigned it to. This business took up a month, during which time we lived in ready-furnished lodgings on the Great Quay, where all the respect was shown us as was due to our quality.

Here my husband hired two more men-servants, and I took two maids, and turned Isabel, who was a well-bred agreeable girl into my companion; but that I might not be too much fatigued, my husband went to the Hague first, and left me, with three maids and Thomas, at Rotterdam, while he took a house, furnished it, and had everything ready for my reception, which was done with great expedition. One of his footmen came with a letter to me one morning, to let me know his master would come by the scout next day to take me home, in which he desired that I would prepare for my departure. I soon got everything ready, and the next morning, on the arrival of the scout, I saw my husband; and we both, with all the servants, left the city of Rotterdam, and safely got to the Hague the afternoon following.

It was now the servants had notice given them to call me by the name of 'my lady,' as the honour of baronetage had entitled me, and with which title I was pretty well satisfied, but should have been more so, had not I yet the higher title of countess in view.

I now lived in a place where I knew nobody, neither was I known, on which I was pretty careful whom I became acquainted with; our circumstances were very good, my husband loving, to the greatest degree, my servants respectful; and, in short, I lived the happiest life woman could enjoy, had my former crimes never crept into my guilty conscience.

I was in this happy state of life, when I wrote a letter to the Quaker, in which I gave her a direction where she might send to me. And about a fortnight after, as I was one afternoon stepping into my coach, in order to take an airing, the postman came to our door with letters, one of which was directed to me, and as soon as I saw it was the Quaker's hand, I bid the coachman put up again, and went into my closet to read the contents, which were as follow :

DEAR FRIEND,

I have had occasion to write to thee several times since we saw each other, but as this is my first letter, so it shall contain all the business thou wouldst know. I got safe to London, by thy careful ordering of the coach, and the attendants were not at all wanting in their duty. When I had been at home a few days, thy woman, Mrs. Amy, came to see me, so I took her to task as thou ordered me, about murdering thy pretended daughter; she declared her innocence, but said she had procured a false evidence to swear a large debt against her, and, by that means, had put her into a prison, and feed the keepers to hinder her from sending any letter, or message, out of the prison, to any person whatever. This, I suppose, was the reason thou thought she was murdered, because thou wert relieved from her by this base usage. However, when I heard of it, I checked Amy very much, but was well satisfied to hear she was alive. After this I did not hear from Amy for above a month, and in the interim (as I knew thou wast safe), I sent a friend of mine to pay the debt, and release the prisoner, which he did, but was so indiscreet as to let her know who was the benefactress. My next care was to manage thy Spitalfields' business, which I did with much exactness. And the day that I received thy last letter, Amy came to me again, and I read as much of it to her, as she was concerned in: nay, I entreated her to drink tea with me, and after it one glass of citron, in which she drank towards thy good health, and she told me she would come to thee as soon as possible. Just as she was gone, I was reading thy letter again in the little parlour, and that turbulent creature (thy pretended daughter) came to me, as she said, to return thanks for the favour I had done her, so I accidentally laid thy letter down in the window, while I went to fetch her a glass of cordial, for she looked sadly; and before I returned, I heard the street-door shut, on which I went back without the liquor, not knowing who might have come in, but missing her, I thought she might be gone to stand at the door, and the wind had blown it to; but I was never the nearer, she was sought for in vain; so when I believed her to be quite gone, I looked to see if I missed anything, which I did not; but at last, to my great surprise, I missed your letter, which she certainly took, and made off with. I was so terrified at this unhappy chance, that I fainted away, and had not one of my maidens come in at that juncture, it might have been attended with fatal consequences. I would advise thee to prepare thyself to see her, for I verily believe she will come to thee. I dread your knowing of this, but hope the best. Before I went to fetch the unhappy cordial, she told me, as she had often done before, that she was the eldest daughter, that the captain's wife was your second daughter, and her sister, and that the youngest sister was dead. She also said, there were two brothers, the eldest of whom had never been seen by any of them, since he run away from an uncle's at nine years of age, and that the youngest had been taken care of by an old lady that kept her coach, whom he took to be his godmother. She gave me a long history in what manner she was arrested, and flung into Whitechapel jail, how hardly she fared there, and at length, the keeper's wife, to whom she told her pitiful story, took compassion of her, and recommended her to the bounty of a certain lady who lived in that neighbourhood, that redeemed prisoners for small sums, and who lay for their fees, every return of the day of her nativity; that she was one of the six the lady had discharged; that the lady prompted her to seek after her mother; that she thereupon did seek thee in all the towns and villages between London and Dover; that not finding thee at Dover she went to Deal; and that, at length, she being tired of seeking thee, she returned by shipping to London, where she was no sooner arrived, but she was immediately arrested, and flung into the Marshalsea prison, where she lived in a miserable condition, without the use of pen, ink, and paper, and without the liberty of having any one of her friends come near her. In this condition I was, continued she, when you sent and paid my debt for me, and discharged me. When she had related all this, she fell into such a fit of crying, sighing, and sobbing, from which when she was a little recovered she broke out into loud exclamations against the wickedness of the people in England, that they could be so unchristian as to arrest her twice, when she said it was as true as the gospel that she never did owe to any one person the sum of one shilling in all her life; that she could not think who it was, that should owe her so much ill-will, for that she was not conscious to herself that she had any ways offended any person in the whole universal world, except Mrs. Amy, in the case of her mother, which, she affirmed, she was acquitted of by all men, and hoped she should be so by her Maker; and that if she (Mrs. Amy) had any hand in her sufferings, God would forgive her, as she heartily did. But then, she added, I will not stay in England, I will go all over the world, I will go to France, to Paris; I know my mother did once live there; and if I do not find her there, I will go through Holland, to Amsterdam, to Rotterdam; in short, I will go till I find my mother out, if I should die in the pursuit. I should be glad to hear of thine and thy spouse's welfare, and remain with much sincerity,

Your sincere friend,

The ninth of the month called October.

M. P.

P.S. If thou hast any business to transact in this city, pray let me know; I shall use my best endeavours to oblige thee; my daughters all join with me in willing thee a hearty farewell.

I concealed my surprise for a few minutes, only till I could get into the summer-house, at the bottom of our large garden; but when I was shut in, no living soul can describe the agony I was in; I raved, tore, fainted away, swore, prayed, wished, cried, and promised, but all availed nothing, I was now stuck in to see the worst of it, let what would happen.

At last I came to the following resolution, which was to write a letter to the Quaker, and in it enclose a fifty pound bank-bill, and tell the Quaker to give that to the young woman, if she called again, and also to let her know, a fifty pound bill should be sent her every year, so long as she made no inquiry after me, and kept herself retired in England. Although this opened myself too full to the Quaker, yet I thought I had better venture my character abroad, than destroy my peace at home.

Soon after, my husband came home, and he perceived I had been crying, and asked what was the reason; I told him that I had shed tears both for joy and sorrow: For, said I, I have received one of the tenderest letters from Amy, as it was possible for any person, and she tells me in it, added I, that she will soon come to see me; which so overjoyed me, that I cried, and after it, I went to read the letter a second time, as I was looking out of the summer-house window over the canal; and in unfolding it, I accidentally let it fall in, by which mischance it is lost, for which I am very sorry, as I intended you should see it. Pray, my dear, said he, do not let that give you any uneasiness; if Amy comes, and you approve of it, you have my consent to take her into the house, in what capacity you please. I am very glad, continued he, that you have nothing of more consequence to be uneasy at, I fancy you would make but an indifferent help-mate if you had. Oh! thought I to myself, if you but knew half the things that lie on my conscience, I believe you would think that I bear them out past all example.

About ten days afterwards, as we were sitting at dinner, with two gentlemen, one of the footmen came to the door, and said, My lady, here is a gentlewoman at the door, who desires to speak with you: she says her name is Mrs. Amy.

I no sooner heard her name, but I was ready to swoon away, but I ordered the footman to call Isabel, and ask the gentlewoman to walk up with her into my dressing-room; which he immediately did, and there I went to have my first interview with her. She kissed me for joy, when she saw me, and I sent Isabel down stairs, for I was in pain till I had some private conversation with my old confidant.

There was not much ceremony between us, before I told her all the material circumstances that had happened in her absence, especially about the girl's imprisonments which she had contrived, and how she had got my letter at the Quaker's, the very day she had been there. Well, says Amy, when I had told her all, I find nothing is to ensue, if she lives, but your ruin; you would not agree to her death, so I will not make myself uneasy about her life; it might have been rectified, but you were angry with me, for giving you the best of counsel, viz., when I proposed to murder her.

Hussy, said I, in the greatest passion imaginable, How dare you mention the word murder? You wretch you, I could find in my heart, if my husband and the company were gone, to kick you out of my house. Have you not done enough to kill her, in throwing her into one of the worst jails in England, where, you see, that Providence in a peculiar manner appeared to her assistance. Away! thou art a wicked wretch, thou art a murderer in the sight of God.

I will say no more, says Amy, but if I could have found her, after thy friend the Quaker had discharged her out of the Marshalsea prison, I had laid a scheme to have her taken up for a theft, and by that means got her transported for fourteen years. She will be with you soon, I am sure; I believe she is now in Holland.

While we were in this discourse, I found the gentlemen who dined with us, were going, so we came down stairs, and I went into the parlour to take leave of them, before their departure. When they were gone, my husband told me he had been talking with them about taking upon him the title of Count or Earl of ———, as he had told me of, and as an opportunity now offered, he was going to put it in execution.

I told him I was so well settled, as not to want anything this world could afford me, except the continuance of his life and love (though the very thing he had mentioned, joined with the death of my daughter, in the natural way, would have been much more to my satisfaction). Well, my dear, says he, the expense will be but small, and as I promised you the title, it shall not be long before the honour shall be brought home to your toilette. He was as good as his word, for that day week he brought the patent home to me, in a small box covered with crimson velvet and two gold hinges. There, my lady countess, says he, long may you live to bear the title, for I am certain you are a credit to it. In a few days after, I had the pleasure to see our equipage, as coach, chariot, &c., all new painted, and a coronet fixed at the proper place, and, in short, everything was proportioned to our quality, so that our house vied with most of the other nobility.

It was at this juncture, that I was at the pinnacle of all my worldly felicity, notwithstanding my soul was black with the foulest crimes. And at the same time I may begin to reckon the beginning of my misfortunes, which were in embryo, but were very soon brought forth, and hurried me on to the greatest distress.

As I was sitting one day talking to Amy, in our parlour, and the street door being left open by one of the servants, I saw my daughter pass by the window, and without any ceremony, she came to the parlour door, and opening of it, came boldly in; I was terribly amazed, and asked her who she wanted, as if I had not known her, but Amy's courage was quite lost, and she swooned away. Your servant, my lady, says she; I thought I should never have had the happiness to see you tête-a-tête, till your agent, the Quaker, in Haydon-yard, in the Minories, carelessly left a direction for me in her own window; however, she is a good woman, for she released me out of a jail, in which, I believe, that base wretch (pointing to Amy, who was coming to herself) caused me to be confined. As soon as Amy recovered, she flew at her like a devil, and between them there was so much noise as alarmed the servants, who all came to see what was the matter. Amy had pulled down one of my husband's swords, drawn it, and was just going to run her through the body, as the servants came in, who not knowing anything of the matter, some of them secured Amy, others held the girl, and the rest were busy about me, to prevent my fainting away, which was more than they could do, for I fell into strong fits, and in the interim they turned the girl out of the house, who was fully bent on revenge.

My lord, as I now called him, was gone out a hunting; I was satisfied he knew nothing of it, as yet, and when Amy and I were thoroughly come to ourselves, we thought it most advisable to find the girl out, and give her a handsome sum of money to keep her quiet. So Amy went out, but in all her searching could hear nothing of her; this made me very uneasy; I guessed she would contrive to see my lord before he came home, and so it proved, as you shall presently hear.

When night came on, that I expected his return, I wondered I did not see him; Amy sat up in my chamber with me, and was as much concerned as was possible. Well, he did not come in all that night, but the next morning, about ten o'clock, he rapped at the door, with the girl along with him. When it was opened, he went into the great parlour, and bid Thomas go call down his lady; this was the crisis; I now summoned up all my resolution, and took Amy down with me, to see if we could not baffle the girl, who, to an inch, was her mother's own child.

It will be necessary here to give a short account of our debate, because on it all my future misery depended, and it made me lose my husband's love, and own my daughter; who would not rest there, but told my lord how many brothers and sisters she had.

When we entered the room, my lord was walking very gravely about it, but with his brows knit, and a wild confusion in his face, as if all the malice and revenge of a Dutchman had joined to put me out of countenance before I spoke a word.

Pray, madam, says he, do you know this young woman? I expect a speedy and positive answer, without the least equivocation.

Really, my lord, replied I, to give you an answer as quick as you desire, I declare I do not.

Do not! said he, what do you mean by that? She tells me that you are her mother, and that her father run away from you, and left two sons, and two daughters besides herself, who were all sent to their relations for provision, after which you run away with a jeweller to Paris. Do you know anything of this? answer me quickly.

My lord, said the girl, there is Mrs. Amy, who was my mother's servant at the time (as she told me herself about three months ago), knows very well I am the person I pretend to be, and caused me to be thrown into jail for debts I knew nothing of, because I should not find out my mother to make myself known to her before she left England.

After this, she told my lord everything she knew of me, even in the character of Roxana, and described my dress so well, that he knew it to be mine.

When she had gone quite through her long relation, Well madam, says he, now let me see if I cannot tell how far she has told the truth in relation to you. When I first became acquainted with you, it was on the sale of those jewels, in which I stood so much your friend, at a time that you were in the greatest distress, your substance being in the hands of the Jew; you then passed for a jeweller's widow; this agrees with her saying you run away with a jeweller. In the next place, you would not consent to marry me about twelve years ago; I suppose then your real husband was living, for nothing else could tally with your condescension to me in everything except marriage. Since that time, your refusing to come to Holland in the vessel I had provided for you, under a distant prospect of your being with child, though in reality it was your having a child too much, as the captain told me of, when I, being ignorant of the case, did not understand him. Now, continued he, she says that you are the identical Lady Roxana, which made so much noise in the world, and has even described the robe and head-dress you wore on that occasion, and in that I know that she is right: for, to my own knowledge, you have that very dress by you now, I having seen you dressed in it at our lodging at the Quaker's. From all these circumstances, says he, I may be assured that you have imposed grossly upon me, and instead of being a woman of honour as I took you for, I find that you have been an abandoned wretch, and had nothing to recommend you but a sum of money and a fair countenance, joined to a false unrelenting heart.

These words of my lord's struck such a damp upon my spirits, as made me unable to speak in my turn. But at last, I spoke as follows: My lord, I have most patiently stood to hear all it was possible for you to allege against me, which has no other proof than imagination. That I was the wife of a brewer, I have no reason now to deny, neither had I any occasion before to acknowledge it. I brought him a handsome fortune, which joined to his, made us appear in a light far superior to our neighbours; I had also five children by him, two sons and three daughters, and had my husband been as wise as rich, we might have lived happily together now. But it was not so, for he minded nothing but sporting, in almost every branch; and closely following of it soon run out all his substance, and then left me in an unhappy, helpless condition. I did not send my children to my relations till the greatest necessity drove me, and after that, hearing my husband was dead, I married the jeweller, who was afterwards murdered. If I had owned how many children I had, the jeweller would not have married me, and the way of life I was in would not keep my family, so I was forced to deny them, in order to get them bread. Neither can I say that I have either heard or known anything of my children since, excepting that I heard they were all taken care of; and this was the very reason I would not marry you, when you offered it some years since, for these children lay seriously at my heart, and as I did not want money, my inclination was to come to England, and not entail five children upon you the day of marriage.

Pray, madam, said my lord, interrupting me, I do not find that you kept up to your resolutions when you got there; you were so far from doing your duty as a parent, that you even neglected the civility of acquaintances, for they would have asked after them, but your whole scheme has been to conceal yourself as much as possible, and even when you were found out, denied yourself, as witness the case of your daughter here. As to the character of Lady Roxana, which you so nicely managed, said he, did that become a woman that had five children, whose necessity had obliged you to leave them, to live in a continual scene of pageantry and riot, I could almost say debauchery? Look into your conduct, and see if you deserve to have the title or the estate you now so happily enjoy.

After this speech, he walked about the room in a confused manner for some minutes, and then addressed himself to Amy. Pray, Mrs. Amy, says he, give me your judgment in this case, for although I know you are as much as possible in your lady's interest, yet I cannot think you have so little charity as to think she acted like a woman of worth and discretion: Do you really think, as you knew all of them from infants, that this young woman is your lady's daughter?

Amy, who always had spirits enough about her, said at once, she believed the girl was my daughter; And truly, says she, I think your man Thomas is her eldest son, for the tale he tells of his birth and education suits exactly with our then circumstances.

Why indeed, said my lord, I believe so too, for I now recollect that when we first took him into our service at Dover, he told me he was the son of a brewer in London, that his father had run away from his mother, and left her in a distressed condition with five children, of which he was second child, or eldest son.

Thomas was then called into the parlour, and asked what he knew of his family; he repeated all as above, concerning his father's running away and leaving me; but said that he had often asked and inquired after them, but without any success, and concluded, that he believed his brothers and sisters were distributed in several places, and that his mother died in the greatest distress, and was buried by the parish.

Indeed, said my lord, it is my opinion that Thomas is one of your sons; do not you think the same? addressing himself to me.

From the circumstances that have been related, my lord, said I, I now believe that these are both my children; but you would have thought me a mad woman to have countenanced and taken this young woman in as my child, without a thorough assurance of it; for that would have been running myself to a certain expense and trouble, without the least glimpse of real satisfaction.

Pray, said my lord to my daughter, let me know what is become of your brothers and sisters; give me the best account of them that you can.

My lord, replied she, agreeable to your commands, I will inform you to the best of my knowledge; and to begin with myself, who am the eldest of the five, I was put to a sister of my father's with my youngest brother, who, by mere dint of industry, gave us maintenance and education suitable to her circumstances; and she, with my uncle's consent, let me go to service when I was advanced in years; and among the variety of places I lived at, Lady Roxana's was one.

Yes, said Thomas, I knew her there, when I was a valet at my Lord D——'s, the next door; it was there I became acquainted with her; and she, by the consent of the gentlewoman, pointing to Amy, let me see the Lady Roxana's fine vestment, which she danced in at the grand ball.

Well, continued my daughter, after I left this place, I was at several others before I became acquainted with Mrs. Amy a second time (I knew her before as Roxana's woman), who told me one day some things relating to my mother, and from thence I concluded if she was not my mother herself (as I at first thought she was), she must be employed by her; for no stranger could profess so much friendship, where there was no likelihood of any return, after being so many years asunder.

After this, I made it my business to find your lady out if possible, and was twice in her company, once on board the ship you were to have come to Holland in, and once at the Quaker's house in the Minories, London; but as I gave her broad hints of whom I took her for, and my lady did not think proper to own me, I began to think I was mistaken, till your voyage to Holland was put off. Soon after, I was flung into Whitechapel jail for a false debt, but, through the recommendation of the jailer's wife to the annual charity of the good Lady Roberts, of Mile-End, I was discharged. Whereupon I posted away, seeking my mother all down the Kent road as far as Dover and Deal, at which last place not finding her, I came in a coaster to London, and landing in Southwark, was immediately arrested, and confined in the Marshalsea prison, where I remained some time, deprived of every means to let any person without the prison know my deplorable state and condition, till my chum, a young woman, my bedfellow, who was also confined for debt, was, by a gentleman, discharged. This young woman, of her own free will, went, my lord, to your lodgings in the Minories, and acquainted your landlady, the Quaker, where I was, and for what sum I was confined, who immediately sent and paid the pretended debt, and so I was a second time discharged. Upon which, going to the Quaker's to return her my thanks soon after, a letter from your lady to her, with a direction in it where to find you, falling into my hands, I set out the next morning for the Hague; and I humbly hope your pardon, my lord, for the liberty I have taken; and you may be assured, that whatever circumstances of life I happen to be in, I will be no disgrace to your lordship or family.

Well, said my husband, what can you say of your mother's second child, who I hear was a son ?

My lord, said I, it is in my power to tell you, that Thomas there is the son you mention ; their circumstances are the same, with this difference, that she was brought up under the care of a good aunt, and the boy forced to run away from a bad one, and shift for his bread ever since ; so if she is my daughter, he is my son, and to oblige you, my lord, I own her, and to please myself I will own him, and they two are brother and sister. I had no sooner done speaking, than Thomas fell down before me and asked my blessing : after which, he addressed himself to my lord as follows :

My lord, said he, out of your abundant goodness you took me into your service at Dover ; I told you then the circumstances I was in, which will save your lordship much time by preventing a repetition ; but, if your lordship pleases, it shall be carefully penned down, for such a variety of incidents has happened to me in England, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, France, and the Isle of Man, in which I have travelled for about eighteen years past, as may prove an agreeable amusement to you, when you are cloyed with better company ; for as I have never been anything above a common servant, so my stories shall only consist of facts, and such as are seldom to be met with, as they are all in low life.

Well, Thomas, said my lord, take your own time to do it, and I will reward you for your trouble.

Now, madam, said my lord to my daughter, if you please to proceed : My lord, continued she, my mother's third child, which was a daughter, lived with the relation I did, and got a place to wait upon a young lady whose father and mother were going to settle at Boulogne, in France ; she went with them, and having stayed at this gentleman's (who was a French merchant) two years, was married to a man with the consent of the family she lived in ; and her master, by way of fortune, got him to be master of a French and Holland coaster, and this was the very person whose ship you hired to come to Holland in, the captain's wife was my own sister, consequently my lady's second daughter ; as to my youngest sister, she lived with the uncle and aunt Thomas run away from, and died of the small-pox soon after. My youngest brother was put out apprentice to a carpenter, where he improved in his business, till a gentlewoman came to his master and mistress (which I take by the description they gave me, to be Mrs. Amy), who had him put out to an education fit for a merchant, and then sent him to the Indies, where he is now settled, and in a fair way to get a large estate.

This, my lord, is the whole account I can at present give of them, and although it may seem very strange, I assure you, it is all the just truth.

When she had finished her discourse, my lord turned to me, and said, that since I that was her mother, had neglected doing my duty, though sought so much after, he would take it upon himself to see both the girl and Thomas provided for, without any advising or letting me know anything about them. And added, with a malicious sneer, I must take care of the child I have had by you too, or it will have but an indifferent parent to trust to in case of my decease.

This finished the discourse, and my lord withdrew into his study, in a humour that I am unable to describe, and left me, Amy, Thomas, and my daughter Susanna, as I must now call her, in the parlour together. We sat staring at each other some time, till at last Amy said, I suppose, my lady, you have no farther business with your new daughter; she has told her story, and may now dispose of herself to the best advantage she can. No, said I, I have nothing to say to her, only that she shall never be admitted into my presence again. The poor girl burst out into tears, and said, Pray, my lady, excuse me, for I am certain that were you in my circumstances, you would have done the very action I have, and would expect a pardon for committing the offence.

After this, I said to Thomas, Keep what has been said, to yourself, and I shall speak to you by and by; and then I withdrew, and went upstairs to my closet, leaving Amy with Susanna, who soon dismissed her, and followed me.

When Amy came to me, Now, my lady, says she, what do think of this morning's work? I believe my lord is not so angry as we were fearful of. You are mistaken in your lord, Amy, said I, and are not so well acquainted with the deep and premeditated revenge of Dutchmen as I am, and although it may not be my husband's temper, yet I dread it as much, but shall see more at dinner time.

Soon after this, my husband called Thomas, and bid him order the cloth for his dinner to be laid in his study, and bid him tell his mother that he would dine by himself; when I heard this, I was more shocked than I had been yet. Now his anger begins to work, Amy, said I, how must I act? I do not know, answered she, but I will go into the study, and try what can be done, and, as a faithful mediator, will try to bring you together. She was not long before she returned, and bursting into tears, I know not what to do, says she, for your husband is in a deep study, and when I told him you desired him to dine with you in the parlour as usual, he only said, Mrs. Amy, go to your lady, tell her to dine when and where she pleases, and pray obey her as your lady; but let her know from me, that she has lost the tenderness I had for her as a wife, by the little thought she had of her children.

Nothing could have shocked me more than the delivery of this message by Amy; I, almost bathed in tears, went to him myself? found him in a melancholy posture reading in Milton's 'Paradise Regained;' he looked at me very sternly when I entered his study, told me he had nothing to say to me at that time, and if I had a mind not to disturb him I must leave him for the present. My lord, said I, supposing all that has been said by this girl was truth, what reason have you to be in this unforgiving humour? What have I done to you to deserve this usage? Have you found any fault with me since I had the happiness of being married to you? Did you ever find me in any company that you did not approve of? Have you any reason to think that I have wasted any of your substance? If you have none of these things to allege against me, for heaven's sake do not let us now make our lives unhappy, for my having had legitimate children by a lawful husband, at a time that you think it no crime to have had a natural son by me, which I have the most reason to repent of.

I spoke the latter part of these words with a small air of authority, that he might think me the less guilty; but, I believe, he only looked on what I had said as a piece of heroism; for he soon after delivered himself in the following speech: Madam, do you not think that you have used me in a very deceitful manner? If you think that I have not had that usage, I will, in a few words, prove the contrary. When first I knew you, soon after the jeweller's death at Paris, you never mentioned, in all that intricate affair I was engaged in for you, so much as your having any children; that, as your circumstances then were, could have done you no harm, but, on the contrary, it would have moved the compassion of your bitter enemy, the Jew, if he had any. Afterwards, when I first saw you in London, and began to treat with you about marriage, your children, which, to all prudent women, are the first things provided for, were so far neglected as not to be spoken of, though mine were mentioned to you; and as our fortunes were very considerable, yours might very well have been put into the opposite scale with them. Another great piece of your injustice was, when I offered to settle your own fortune upon yourself, you would not consent to it; I do not look on that piece of condescension out of love to me, but a thorough hatred you had to your own flesh and blood; and lastly, your not owning your daughter, though she strongly hinted who she was to you, when she was twice in your company, and even followed you from place to place while you were in England. Now, if you can reconcile this piece of inhumanity with yourself, pray try what you can say to me about your never telling me the life you led in Pall Mall, in the character of Roxana? You scrupled to be happily married to me, and soon after came to England, and was a reputed whore to any nobleman that would come up to your price, and lived with one a considerable time, and was taken by several people to be his lawful wife. If any gentleman should ask me what I have taken to my bed, what must I answer? I must say an inhuman false-hearted whore, one that had not tenderness enough to own her own children, and has too little virtue, in my mind, to make a good wife.

I own I would, says he, have settled your own estate upon you with great satisfaction, but I will not do it now; you may retire to your chamber, and when I have any occasion to speak with you, I will send a messenger to you; so, my undeserving lady countess, you may walk out of the room.

I was going to reply to all this, but instead of hearing me, he began to speak against the Quaker, who, he supposed, knew all the intrigues of my life; but I cleared her innocence, by solemnly declaring it was a thorough reformation of my past life that carried me to live at the Quaker's house, who knew nothing of me before I went to live with her, and that she was, I believed, a virtuous woman.

I went away prodigiously chagrined. I knew not what course to take; I found expostulation signified nothing, and all my hopes depended on what I might say to him after we were gone to bed at night. I sent in for Amy, and having told her our discourse, she said she knew not what to think of him, but hoped it would, by great submission, wear off by degrees. I could eat but little dinner, and Amy was more sorrowful than hungry, and, after we had dined, we walked by ourselves in the garden, to know what we had best pursue. As we were walking about, Thomas came to us, and told us that the young woman who had caused all the words, had been at the door, and delivered a letter to my lord's footman, who had carried it up stairs, and that she was ordered to go to his lordship in his study, which struck me with a fresh and sensible grief. I told Thomas, as he was to be her brother, to learn what my lord had said to her, if he could, as she came down; on which he went into the house to obey his order.

He was not gone in above a quarter of an hour before he came to me again, and told me she was gone, and that my lord had given her a purse of twenty guineas, with orders to live retired, let nobody know who or what she was, and come to him again in about a month's time. I was very much satisfied to hear this, and was in hopes of its proving a happy omen; and I was better pleased about two hours after, when Thomas came to me, to let me know that my lord had given him thirty guineas, and bid him take off his livery, and new clothe himself, for he intended to make him his first clerk, and put him in the way of making his fortune. I now thought it was impossible for me to be poor, and was inwardly rejoiced that my children (meaning Thomas and Susanna) were in the high road to grow rich.

As Amy and I had dined by ourselves, my lord kept his study all the day, and at night, after supper, Isabel came and told me that my lord's man had received orders to make his bed in the crimson room, which name it received from the colour of the bed and furniture, and was reserved against the coming of strangers, or sickness. When she had delivered her message she withdrew, and I told Amy it would be to no purpose to go to him again, but I would have her lie in a small bed, which I ordered immediately to be carried into my chamber. Before we went to bed, I went to his lordship to know why he would make us both look so little among our own servants, as to part, bed and board, so suddenly.

He only said, My Lady Roxana knows the airs of quality too well to be informed that a scandal among nobility does not consist in parting of beds, to be now told it; if you cannot lie by yourself, you may send a letter to my Lord —, whom you lived with as a mistress in Loudon; perhaps he may want a bedfellow as well as you, and come to you at once: you are too well acquainted with him to stand upon ceremony.

I left him, with my heart full of malice, grief, shame, and revenge; I did not want a good will to do any mischief; but I wanted an unlimited power to put all my wicked thoughts in execution.

Amy and I lay in our chamber, and the next morning, at breakfast, we were talking of what the servants (for there were thirteen of them in all, viz., two coachmen, four footmen, a groom, and postilion, two women cooks, two housemaids, and a laundry-maid, besides Isabel, who was my waiting-maid, and Amy, who acted as housekeeper) could say of the disturbance that was in the family. Pho! said Amy, never trouble your head about that, for family quarrels are so common in noblemen's houses, both here and in England, that there are more families parted, both in bed and board, than live lovingly together. It can be no surprise to the servants, and if your neighbours should hear it, they will only think you are imitating the air of nobility, and have more of that blood in you than you appeared to have when you and your lord lived happily together.

The time, I own, went very sluggishly on; I had no company but Amy and Isabel, and it was given out among the servants of noblemen and gentry that I was very much indisposed; for I thought it a very improper time either to receive or pay visits.

In this manner I lived till the month was up that my daughter was to come again to my lord, for although I went morning, noon, and night, into his apartment to see him, I seldom had a quarter of an hour's discourse with him, and oftentimes one of his valets would be sent to tell me his lord was busy, a little before the time I usually went, which I found was to prevent my going in to him, but this was only when he was in an ill humour, as his man called it.

Whether my lord used to make himself uneasy for want of mine, or other company, I cannot tell, but the servants complained every day, as I heard by Amy, that his lordship eat little or nothing, and would sometimes shed tears when he sat down by himself to breakfast, dinner, or supper; and, indeed, I began to think that he looked very thin, his countenance grew pale, and that he had every other sign of a grieved or broken heart.

My daughter came to him one Monday morning, and stayed with him in his study near two hours; I wondered at the reason of it, but could guess at nothing certain; and at last she went away, but I fixed myself so as to see her as she passed by me, and she appeared to have a countenance full of satisfaction.

In the evening, when I went in as usual, he spoke to me in a freer style than he had done since our breach. Well madam (for he had not used the words 'my lady' at any time after my daughter's coming to our house), said he, I think I have provided for your daughter. As how, my lord, pray will you let me know? said I. Yes, replied he, as I have reason to think you will be sorry to hear of her welfare in any shape, I will tell you. A gentleman who is going factor for the Dutch East India Company, on the coast of Malabar, I have recommended her to; and he, on my character and promise of a good fortune, will marry her very soon; for the Company's ships sail in about twelve days; so, in a fortnight, like a great many mothers as there are now-a-days, you may rejoice at having got rid of one of your children, though you neither know where, how, or to whom.

Although I was very glad my lord spoke to me at all, and more especially so at my daughter's going to be married, and settling in the Indies, yet his words left so sharp a sting behind them as was exceeding troublesome to me to wear off. I did not dare venture to make any farther inquiries, but was very glad of what I heard, and soon bidding my lord good night, went and found Amy, who was reading a play in the chamber.

I waited with the greatest impatience for this marriage; and when I found the day was fixed, I made bold to ask my lord if I should not be present in his chamber when the ceremony was performed? This favour was also denied me. I then asked my lord's chaplain to speak to him on that head, but he was deaf to his importunities, and bade him tell me that I very well knew his mind. The wedding was performed on a Wednesday evening, in my lord's presence, and he permitted nobody to be there but a sister of the bridegroom's, and Thomas (now my lord's secretary or chief clerk), who was brother to the bride, and who gave her away. They all supped together after the ceremony was over, in the great dining-room, where the fortune was paid, which was 2,000*l.* (as I heard from Thomas afterwards), and the bonds for the performance of the marriage were re-delivered.

Next morning, my lord asked me if I was willing to see my daughter before she sailed to the Indies. My lord, said I, as the seeing of her was the occasion of this great breach that has happened between us, so if your lordship will let me have a sight of her and a reconciliation with you at the same time, there is nothing can be more desirable to me, or would more contribute to my happiness during the rest of my life.

No, madam, says he, I would have you see your daughter, to be reconciled to her, and give her your blessing (if a blessing can proceed from you), at parting; but our reconciliation will never be completed till one of us comes near the verge of life, if then; for I am a man that am never reconciled without ample amends, which is a thing that is not in your power to give, without you can alter the course of nature, and recall time.

On hearing him declare himself so open, I told him that my curse instead of my blessing would pursue my daughter, for being the author of all the mischiefs that had happened between us. No, madam, said he, if you had looked upon her as a daughter heretofore, I should have had no occasion to have had any breach with you; the whole fault lies at your own door; for whatever your griefs may inwardly be, I would have you recollect they were of your own choosing.

I found I was going to give way to a very violent passion, which would, perhaps, be the worse for me, so I left the room, and went up to my own chamber, not without venting bitter reproaches both against my daughter and her unknown husband.

However, the day she was to go on shipboard, she breakfasted with my lord, and as soon as it was over, and my lord was gone into his study to fetch something out, I followed him there, and asked him if he would give me leave to present a gold repeating watch to my daughter before she went away? I thought he seemed somewhat pleased with this piece of condescension in me, though it was done more to gain his goodwill than to express any value I had for her. He told me that he did not know who I could better make such a present to, and I might give it to her if I pleased. Accordingly, I went and got it out of my cabinet in a moment, and bringing it to my lord, desired he would give it her from me. He asked me if I would not give it her myself? I told him no: I wished her very well, but had nothing to say to her till I was restored to his lordship's bed and board.

About two hours after all this, the coach was ordered to the door, and my daughter, and her new husband, the husband's sister, and my son Thomas, all went into it, in order to go to the house of a rich uncle of the bridegroom's, where they were to dine before they went on board, and my lord went there in a sedan about an hour after; and having eaten their dinner, which on this occasion was the most elegant, they all went on board the Indiaman, where my lord and my son Thomas stayed till the ship's crew was hauling in their anchors to sail, and then came home together in the coach, and it being late in the evening, he told Thomas he should sup with him that night; after which they went to bed in their several apartments.

Next morning, when I went to see my lord, as usual, he told me, that as he had handsomely provided for my daughter, and sent her to the Indies with a man of merit and fortune, he sincerely wished her great prosperity; and he added, To let you see, madam, that I should never have parted from my first engagements of love to you, had you not laid yourself so open to censure for your misconduct, my next care shall be to provide for your son Thomas, in a handsome manner, before I concern myself with my son by you.

This was the subject of our discourse, with which I was very well pleased; I only wished my daughter had been married and sent to the Indies before I had married myself; but I began to hope that the worst would be over when Thomas was provided for too, and the son my lord had by me, who was now at the university, was at home; which I would have brought to pass, could my will be obeyed; but I was not to enjoy that happiness.

My lord and I lived with a secret discontent of each other for near a twelvemonth, before I saw any provision made for my son Thomas, and then I found my lord bought him a very large plantation in Virginia, and was furnishing him to go there in a handsome manner; he also gave him four quarter parts in four large trading West India vessels, in which he boarded a great quantity of merchandise to traffic with, when he came to the end of his voyage; so that he was a very rich man, before he (what we call) came into the world.

The last article that was to be managed, was to engage my son to a wife, before he left Holland; and it happened that the gentleman who was the seller of the plantation my husband bought, had been a Virginia planter in that colony a great many years; but his life growing on the decline, and his health very dubious, he had come to Holland with an intent to sell his plantation, and then had resolved to send for his wife, son, and daughter, to come to him with the return of the next ships. This gentleman had brought over with him the pictures of all his family, which he was showing to my lord, at the same time he was paying for the effects; and on seeing the daughter's picture, which appeared to him very beautiful, my lord inquired if she was married; No, my lord, says the planter, but I believe I shall dispose of her soon after she comes to me. How old is your daughter? said my lord. Why, my lord, replied the planter, she is twenty-two years of age. Then my lord asked my son if he should like that young lady for a wife? Nothing, my lord, said Thomas, could lay a greater obligation upon me than your lordship's providing me with a wife.

Now, sir, said my lord to the planter, what do you say to a match between this young gentleman and your daughter? their ages are agreeable, and if you can, or will, give her more fortune than he has, his shall be augmented; you partly know his substance, by the money I have now paid you.

This generous proposal of my lord's pleased the planter to a great degree, and he declared to my lord that he thought nothing could be a greater favour done him, for two reasons; one of which was, that he was certain the young gentleman was as good as he appeared, because he had taken, for his plantation, so large a sum of money, as none but a gentleman could pay. The next reason was, that this marriage, to be performed as soon as my son arrived there, would be a great satisfaction to his wife, whose favourite the daughter was ; For, added he, my wife will not only have the pleasure of seeing her daughter settled on what was our own hereditary estate, but also see her married to a man of substance, without the danger of crossing the seas to be matched to a person equal to herself.

Pray, sir, said my lord, let me hear what fortune you are willing to give with your daughter ; you have but two children, and I know you must be rich. Why, my lord, replied the planter, there is no denying that ; but you must remember I have a son as well as a daughter to provide for, and he I intend to turn into the mercantile way as soon as he arrives safe from Virginia. I have, my lord, continued he, a very large stock in trade there, as warehouses of tobacco, &c., lodged in the custom-houses of the ports, to the value of 7,000*l.*, to which I will add 3,000*l.* in money, and I hope you will look upon that as a very competent estate ; and when the young gentleman's fortune is joined to that, I believe he will be the richest man in the whole American colonies, of his age.

It was then considered between my lord and Thomas, that no woman with a quarter of that fortune, would venture herself over to the West Indies with a man that had ten times as much ; so it being hinted to the planter that my lord had agreed to the proposals, they promised to meet the next morning to settle the affair.

In the evening, my lord, with Thomas in his company, hinted the above discourse to me. I was frightened almost out of my wits to think what a large sum of money had been laid out for my son ; but kept what I thought to myself. It was agreed that my son was to marry the old planter's daughter, and a lawyer was sent for, with instructions to draw up all the writings for the marriage settlement, &c., and the next morning a messenger came from the planter with a note to my lord ; letting him know, if it was not inconvenient, he would wait on his lordship to breakfast ; he came soon after with a Dutch merchant of great estate, who was our neighbour at the Hague, where they settled every point in question, and the articles were all drawn up and signed by the several parties the next day before dinner.

There was nothing now remaining but my son's departure to his new plantation in Virginia ; great despatch was made that he might be ready to sail in one of his own ships, and take the advantage of an English convoy, which was almost ready to sail. My lord sent several valuable presents to my son's lady, as did her father; and as I was at liberty in this case to do as I would, and knowing my lord had a very great value for my son, I thought that the richer my presents were, the more he would esteem me (but there was nothing in it, the enmity he took against me had taken root in his heart); so I sent her a curious set of china, the very best I could buy, with a silver tea-kettle and lamp, tea-pot, sugar-dish, cream-pot, tea-spoons, &c., and as my lord had sent a golden repeater, I added to it a golden equipage, with my lord's picture hanging to it, finely painted. (This was another thing I did purposely to please him, but it would not do.) A few days after, he came to take his leave of me, by my lord's order, and at my parting with him I shed abundance of tears, to think I was then in an almost strange place, no child that could then come near me, and under so severe a displeasure of my lord, that I had very little hopes of ever being friends with him again.

My life did not mend after my son was gone, all I could do would not persuade my lord to have any free conversation with me; and at this juncture it was, that the foolish jade, Amy, who was now advanced in years, was caught in a conversation with one of my lord's men, which was not to her credit; for it coming to his ears, she was turned out of the house by my lord's orders, and was never suffered to come into it again, during his lifetime, and I did not dare to speak a word in her favour, for fear he should retort upon me, 'Like mistress like maid.'

I could hear nothing of Amy for the first three months after she had left me, till one day, as I was looking out of a dining-room window, I saw her pass by, but I did not dare ask her to come in, for fear my lord should hear of her being there, which would have been adding fuel to the fire; however, she, looking up at the house, saw me; I made a motion to her to stay a little about the door, and in the meantime, I wrote a note, and dropped it out of the window, in which I told her how I had lived in her absence, and desired her to write me a letter, and carry it the next day to my sempstress's house, who would take care to deliver it to me herself.

I told Isabel that she should let me know when the milliner came again, for I had some complaints to her about getting up my best suit of Brussels lace night-clothes. On the Saturday following, just after I had dined, Isabel came into my apartment: My lady, says she, the milliner is in the parlour, will you be pleased to have her sent up stairs, or will your ladyship be pleased to go down to her? Why, send her up, Isabel, said I, she is as able to come to me as I am to go to her; I will see her here.

When the milliner came into my chamber, I sent Isabel to my dressing-room to fetch a small parcel of fine linen which lay there, and in the interim she gave me Amy's letter, which I put into my pocket, and having pretended to be angry about my linen, I gave her the small bundle Isabel brought, and bid her be sure to do them better for the future.

She promised me she would, and went about her business; and when she was gone, I opened Amy's letter, and having read it, found it was to the following purpose, viz., that she had opened a coffee-house, and furnished the upper part of it to let out in lodgings; that she kept two maids and a man, but that the trade of it did not answer as she had reason to expect; she was willing to leave it off, and retire into the country to settle for the rest of her life, but was continually harassed by such disturbance in her conscience as made her unfit to resolve upon anything, and wished there was a possibility for her to see me, that she might open her mind with the same freedom as formerly, and have my advice upon some particular affairs; and such-like discourse.

It was a pretty while before I heard from Amy again, and when I did, the letter was in much the same strain as the former, excepting that things were coming more to a crisis; for she told me in it, that her money was so out, that is, lent as ready money to traders, and trusted for liquors in her house, that if she did not go away this quarter, she should be obliged to run away the next. I very much lamented her unfortunate case, but that could be no assistance to her, as I had it not now in my power to see her when I would, or give her what I pleased, as it had always used to be; so all I could do was to wish her well, and leave her to take care of herself.

About this time it was that I perceived my lord began to look very pale and meagre, and I had a notion he was going into a consumption, but did not dare tell him so, for fear he should say I was daily looking for his death, and was now overjoyed that I saw a shadow of it; nevertheless he soon after began to find himself in a very bad state of health, for he said to me one morning, that my care would not last long, for he believed he was seized by a distemper it was impossible for him to get over. My lord, said I, you do not do me justice in imagining anything concerning me that does not tend to your own happiness, for if your body is out of order my mind suffers for it. Indeed, had he died then, without making a will, it might have been well for me; but he was not so near death as that; and, what was worse, the distemper, which proved a consumption (which was occasioned chiefly by much study, watchings, melancholy thoughts, wilful and obstinate neglect of taking care of his body, and such like things), held him nine weeks and three days after this, before it carried him off.

He now took country lodgings, most delightfully situated, both for air and prospect, and had a maid and man to attend him; I begged on my knees to go with him, but could not get that favour granted; for, if I could, it might have been a means of restoring me to his favour, but our breach was too wide to be thoroughly reconciled, though I used all the endearing ways I had ever had occasion for to creep into his favour.

Before he went out of town, he locked and sealed up every room in the house, excepting my bedchamber, dressing-room, one parlour, and all the offices and rooms belonging to the servants; and, as he had now all my substance in his power, I was in a very poor state for a countess, and began to wish, with great sincerity, that I had never seen him, after I had lived so happy a life as I did at the Quaker's; for notwithstanding our estates, joined together, when we were first married, amounted to 3,376*l.* per annum, and near 18,000*l.* ready money, besides jewels, plate, goods, &c., of a considerable value, yet we had lived in a very high manner since our taking the title of earl and countess upon us; setting up a great house, and had a number of servants; our equipage, such as coach, chariot, horses, and their attendants; a handsome fortune my lord had given to my daughter, and a very noble one to my son, whom he loved very well, not for his being my son, but for the courteous behaviour of him, in never aspiring to anything above a valet, after he knew who he was, till my lord made him his secretary or clerk ; besides all these expenses, my lord, having flung himself into the trade to the Indies, both East and West, had sustained many great and uncommon losses, occasioned by his merchandise being mostly shipped in English bottoms ; and that nation having declared war against the crown of Spain, he was one of the first and greatest sufferers by that power ; so that, on the whole, our estate, which was as above, dwindled to about 1,000*l.* per annum, and our home stock, viz., about 17,000*l.* was entirely gone. This, I believe, was another great mortification to his lordship, and one of the main things that did help to hasten his end ; for he was observed, both by me and all his servants, to be more cast down at hearing of his losses, that were almost daily sent to him, than he was at what had happened between him and me.

Nothing could give more uneasiness than the damage our estate sustained by this traffic ; he looked upon it as a mere misfortune, that no person could avoid ; but I, besides that, thought it was a judgment upon me, to punish me, in the loss of all my ill-got gain ; but when I found that his own fortune began to dwindle, as well as mine, I was almost ready to think it was possible his lordship might have been as wicked a liver as I had, and the same vengeance as had been poured upon me for my repeated crimes, might also be a punishment for him.

As his lordship was in a bad state of health, and had removed to a country lodging, his study and counting-house, as well as his other rooms, were locked and sealed up ; all business was laid aside, excepting such letters as came to him were carried to his lordship to be opened, read, and answered. I also went to see him morning and evening, but he would not suffer me to stay with him a single night ; I might have had another room in the same house, but was not willing the people who kept it should know that there was a misunderstanding between us, so I contented myself to be a constant visitor, but could not persuade him to forgive me the denying of my daughter, and acting the part of Roxana, because I had kept those two things an inviolable secret from him, and everybody else but Amy, and it was carelessness in her conduct at last that was the foundation of all my future misery.

As my lord's weakness increased, so his ill temper, rather than diminish, increased also; I could do nothing to please him, and began to think that he was only peevish because he found it was his turn to go out of the world first. A gentleman that lived near him, as well as his chaplain, persuaded him to have a physician, to know in what state his health was; and by all I could learn, the doctor told him to settle his worldly affairs as soon as he conveniently could; For, says he, although your death is not certain, still your life is very precarious.

The first thing he did after this was to send for the son he had by me, from the university; he came the week afterwards, and the tutor with him, to take care of his pupil. The next day after, my lord came home, and, sending for six eminent men that lived at the Hague, he made his will, and signed it in the presence of them all; and they, with the chaplain, were appointed the executors of it, and guardians of my son.

As I was in a great concern at his making his will unknown to me, and before we were friends, I thought of it in too serious a manner not to speak about it. I did not know where to apply first, but after mature consideration, sent for the chaplain, and he coming to me, I desired he would give me the best intelligence he could about it. My lady, said he, you cannot be so unacquainted with the duty of my function, and the trust my lord has reposed in me, but you must know I shall go beyond my trust in relating anything of that nature to you; all that I can say on that head is, that I would have you make friends with my lord as soon as you possibly can, and get him to make another will, or else take the best care of yourself as lies in your power; for, I assure you, if his lordship dies, you are but poorly provided for.

These last words of the chaplain's most terribly alarmed me; I knew not what to do; and, at last, as if I was to be guided by nothing but the furies, I went to his chamber, and, after inquiring how he did, and hearing that he was far from well, I told him I had heard he had made his will. Yes, said he, I have; and what then? Why, my lord, replied I, I thought it would not have been derogatory to both our honours for you to have mentioned it to me before you did it, and have let me know in what manner you intended to settle your estate; this would have been but acting like a man to his wife, even if you had married me without a fortune ; but as you received so handsomely with me, you ought to have considered it as my substance, as well as your own, that you were going to dispose of.

My lord looked somewhat staggered at what I had said, and, pausing a little while, answered, that he thought, and also looked upon it as a granted opinion, that after a man married a woman, all that she was in possession of was his, excepting he had made a prior writing or settlement to her of any part or all she was then possessed of. Besides, my lady, added he, I have married both your children, and given them very noble fortunes, especially your son ; I have also had great losses in trade, both by sea and land, since you delivered your fortune to me, and even at this time, notwithstanding the appearance we make in the world, I am not worth a third of what I was when we came to settle in Holland ; and then, here is our own son shall be provided for in a handsome manner by me ; for I am thoroughly convinced there will be but little care taken of him if I leave anything in your power for that purpose : witness Thomas and Susanna.

My lord, said I, I am not come into your chamber to know what care you have taken of our child ; I do not doubt but you have acted like a father by it ; what I would be informed in is, what I am to depend upon in case of your decease ; which I, however, hope may be a great many years off yet. You need not concern yourself about that, said he ; your son will take care that you shall not want ; but yet, I will tell you, too, said he, that it may prevent your wishing for my death ; I have, in my will, left all I am possessed of in the world to my son, excepting 1,500*l.* ; out of that, there is 500*l.* for you, 500*l.* among my executors, and the other 500*l.* is to bury me, pay my funeral expenses, and what is overplus I have ordered to be equally divided among my servants.

When I had heard him pronounce these words, I stared like one that was frightened out of his senses. Five hundred pounds for me ! says I ; pray, what do you mean ? What ! am I, that brought you so handsome a fortune, to be under the curb of my son, and ask him for every penny I want ? no, sir, said I, I will not accept it ; I expect to be left in full possession of one half of your fortune, that I may live the remainder of my life like your wife. Madam, replied my lord, you may expect what you please ; if you can make it appear, since I found you out to be a jilt, that I have looked upon you as my wife, everything shall be altered and settled just as you desire; which might then be called your will; but as the case now stands, the will is mine, and so it shall remain.

I thought I should have sunk when I had heard him make this solemn and premeditated declaration; I raved like a mad woman, and, at the end of my discourse, told him that I did not value what could happen to me, even if I was forced to beg my bread, for I would stand the test of my own character; and as I could get nothing by being an honest woman, so I should not scruple to declare that the son you have left what you have to, is a bastard you had by me several years before we were married.

Oh, says he, madam, do you think you can frighten me? no, not in the least; for if you ever mention anything of it, the title, as well as all the estate, will go to another branch of my family, and you will then be left to starve in good earnest, without having the least glimpse of hope to better your fortune; for, added he, it is not very probable that you will be courted for a wife by any man of substance at these years; so if you have a mind to make yourself easy in your present circumstances, you must rest contented with what I have left you, and not prove yourself a whore to ruin your child, in whose power it will be to provide for you in a handsome manner, provided you behave yourself with that respect to him and me as you ought to do; for if any words arise about what I have done, I shall make a fresh will, and, as the laws of this nation will give me liberty, cut you off with a shilling.

My own unhappiness, and his strong and lasting resentment, had kept me at high words, and flowing in tears, for some time; and, as I was unwilling anybody should see me in that unhappy condition, I stayed coolly talking to him, till our son, who had been to several gentlemen's houses about my lord's business, came home to tell his father the success he had met with abroad. He brought in with him bank notes to the amount of 12,000*l.*, which he had received of some merchants he held a correspondence with; at which my lord was well pleased, for he was pretty near out of money at this juncture. After our son had delivered the accounts and bills, and had withdrew, I asked my lord, in a calm tone, to give me the satisfaction of knowing in what manner the losses he had complained to have suffered consisted. You must consider, my lord, said I, that, according to what you have been pleased to inform me of, that we are upwards of 2,000*l.* per annum, besides about 17,000*l.* ready money, poorer than we were when we first came to settle in Holland.

You talk, replied my lord, in a very odd manner; do not you know that I had children of my own by a former wife; and of these I have taken so much care as to provide with very handsome fortunes, which are settled irrevocably upon them; I have, Providence be thanked, given each of them 5,000*l.*, and that is laid in East India stock, sufficient to keep them genteelly, above the frowns of fortune, and free from the fear of want. This, joined to the money I mentioned to you before, as losses at sea, deaths, and bankruptcies, your children's fortunes, which are larger than my own children's, the buying the estate we live on, and several other things, which my receipts and notes will account for, as you may see after my decease; I have, to oblige you on this head, almost descended to particulars, which I never thought to have done; but, as I have, rest yourself contented, and be well assured that I have not wilfully thrown any of your substance away.

I could not tell what he meant by saying he had not wilfully thrown any of my substance away; these words puzzled me, for I found by his discourse I was to have but 500*l.* of all I had brought him, at his decease, which I looked upon to be near at hand. I had but one thing that was any satisfaction to me, which was this; I was assured by him that he had not bestowed above the 15,000*l.* he mentioned to me, on his children by his former wife; and, on an exact calculation, he made it appear that he had bestowed on my son Thomas alone near 13,000*l.* in buying the plantation, shares in vessels, and merchandise, besides several valuable presents sent to his wife, both by him and me; and as for my daughter Susanna, she was very well married to a factor, with a fortune of 2,000*l.* (which was a great sum of money for a woman to have who was immediately to go to the East Indies), besides some handsome presents given to her both by him and me. In fact, her fortune was, in proportion, as large as her brother's, for there is but very few women in England or Holland with 2,000*l.* fortune, that would venture to the coast of Malabar, even to have married an Indian king, much more to have gone over with a person that no one could tell what reception he might meet with, or might be recalled at the pleasure of the Company upon the least distaste taken by the merchants against him; neither would I, though her own mother, hinder her voyage, for she had been the author of all the misfortunes that had happened to me, and if my speaking a word would have saved her from the greatest torment, I believe I should have been quite silent. And I had but one reason to allege for the girl's going so hazardous a voyage, which is, she knew that the match was proposed by my lord, and if he had not thought it would have been advantageous for her, he would never have given 2,000*l.* to her husband as a fortune; and again, as my lord was the only friend she had in our family, she was cunning enough to know that the bare disobliging of him would have been her ruin for ever after; to which I may add, that it is possible, as she had made so much mischief about me, she was glad to get what she could, and go out of the way, for fear my lord and I should be friends; which, if that had happened, she would have been told never to come to our house any more.

As my lord's death began to be daily the discourse of the family, I thought that he might be more reconciled if I entered into the arguments again, pro and con, which we had together before; I did so, but all I could say was no satisfaction, till I importuned him on my knees, with a flood of tears. Madam, said he, what would you have me do? -Do, my lord, said I, only be so tender to my years and circumstances, as to alter your will, or, at least, add a codicil to it; I desire nothing more, for I declare I had rather be a beggar, than live under my child's jurisdiction. To this he agreed with some reluctance, and he added a codicil to his will.

This pleased me greatly, and gave me comfort, for I dreaded nothing so much, after all my high living, as being under any person, relation or stranger, and whether they exercised any power over me or not.

I saw the lawyer come out of the chamber first, but was above asking him any questions; the next were the executors and chaplain; I asked the last how they came to have words: he did not answer me directly, but begged to know whose pleasure it was to have the codicil annexed. It was mine, sir, replied I, and it made me very uneasy before I could have the favour granted. He only replied, by saying, Ah! poor lady, the favour, as you are pleased to term it, is not calculated for any benefit to you; think the worst you can of it.

I was terribly uneasy at what the chaplain had said, but I imagined to myself that I could not be worse off than I thought I should be before the codicil was annexed; and, as he withdrew without saying any more, I was fain to rest satisfied with what I had heard, and that amounted to nothing.

The next day after this, the physicians that attended my lord, told him it was time for him to settle his worldly affairs, and prepare himself for an hereafter. I now found all was over, and I had no other hopes of his life than the physicians' declaration of his being near his death. For it often happens that the gentlemen of the faculty give out that a man is near his death, to make the cure appear to be the effect of their great skill in distempers and medicine; as others, when they cannot find out the real disease, give out that a man's end is near, rather than discover their want of judgment; and this I thought might be the case with our doctors of physic.

Our son was still kept from the university, and lodged at the house of one of his future guardians; but when he heard that his father was so near his end, he was very little out of his presence, for he dearly loved him. My lord sent the day before his death, to lock and seal up all the doors in his dwelling-house at the Hague; and the steward had orders, in case of my lord's decease, not to let anybody come in, not even his lady (who had for some time lodged in the same house with her lord), without an order from the executors.

The keys of the doors were carried to him, and as he saw his death approach, he prepared for it; and in fact, resigned up the keys of everything to the executors, and having bid them all a farewell, they were dismissed; the physicians waited, but as the verge of life approached, and it was out of their power to do him any service, he gave them a bill of 100*l.* for the care they had taken of him, and dismissed them.

I now went into the chamber, and kneeling by his bed-side, kissed him with great earnestness, and begged of him, if ever I had disoblged him in any respect, to forgive me. He sighed, and said he most freely forgave me everything that I had reason to think I had offended him in; but, he added, If you had been so open in your conversation to me before our marriage, as to discover your family and way of life, I know not but that I should have married you as I did; I might now have been in a good state of health, and you many years have lived with all the honours due to the Countess de Wintelsheim. These words drew tears from my eyes, and they being the last of any consequence he said, they had the greater impression upon me. He faintly bid me a long farewell, and said, as he had but a few moments to live, he hoped I would retire, and leave him with our son and chaplain. I withdrew into my own chamber, almost drowned in tears, and my son soon followed me out, leaving the chaplain with his father, offering up his prayers to heaven for the receiving of his soul into the blessed mansions of eternal bliss.

A few minutes after, our son went into the chamber with me again, and received his father's last blessing. The chaplain now saw him departing, and was reading the prayer ordered by the church for that occasion; and while he was doing it, my lord laid his head gently on the pillow, and turning on his left side, departed this life with all the calmness of a composed mind, without so much as a groan, in the fifty-seventh year of his age.

As soon as he was dead, an undertaker was sent for, by order of the executors, who met together immediately, to open his will, and take care of all my son's effects. I was present when it was opened and read; but how terrible I was frightened at hearing the codicil repeated any person may imagine by the substance of it, which was to this effect; that if I had given me any more after his decease than the 500*l.* he had left me, the 500*l.* left to his executors, and the 1000*l.* of my son's estate (which was now a year's interest), was to be given to such poor families at the Hague as were judged to be in the greatest want of it; not to be divided into equal sums, but every family to have according to their merit and necessity. But this was not all; my son was tied down much harder; for if it was known that he gave me any relief, let my condition be ever so bad, either by himself, by his order, or in any manner of way, device, or contrivance that he could think of, one half of his estate, which was particularly mentioned, was to devolve to the executors for ever; and if they granted me ever so small a favour, that sum was to be equally divided among the several parishes where they lived, for the benefit of the poor.

Any person would have been surprised to have seen how we all sat staring at each other ; for though it was signed by all the executors, yet they did not know the substance of it till it was publicly read, excepting the chaplain ; and he, as I mentioned before, had told me the codicil had better never have been added.

I was now in a fine dilemma ; had the title of a countess, with 500*l.*, and nothing else to subsist on, but a very good wardrobe of clothes, which were not looked upon by my son and the executors to be my late lord's property, which were worth, indeed, more than treble the sum I had left me.

I immediately removed from the lodgings, and left them to bury the body when they thought proper, and retired to a lodging at a private gentleman's house, about a mile from the Hague. I was now resolved to find out Amy, being, as it were, at liberty ; and accordingly went to the house where she had lived, and finding that empty, inquired for her among the neighbours, who gave various accounts of what had become of her ; but one of them had a direction left at his house where she might be found. I went to the place, and found the house shut up, and all the windows broken, the sign taken down, and the rails and benches pulled from before the door. I was quite ashamed to ask for her there, for it was a very scandalous neighbourhood, and I concluded that Amy had been brought to low circumstances, and had kept a house of ill-fame, and was either run away herself, or was forced to it by the officers of justice. However, as nobody knew me here, I went into a shop to buy some trifles, and asked who had lived in the opposite house (meaning Amy's). Really, madam, says the woman, I do not well know ; but it was a woman who kept girls for gentlemen ; she went on in that wickedness for some time, till a gentleman was robbed there of his watch and a diamond ring, on which the women were all taken up, and committed to the house of correction ; but the young ones are now at liberty, and keep about the town. Pray, said I, what may have become of the old beast that could be the ruin of those young creatures ? Why, I do not well know, says she ; but I have heard, that as all her goods were seized upon, she was sent to the poor-house ; but it soon after appearing that she had the French disease to a violent degree, was removed to an hospital to be taken care of, but I believe she will never live to come out ; and if she should be so fortunate, the gentleman that was robbed, finding that she was the guilty person, intends to prosecute her to the utmost rigour of the law.

I was sadly surprised to hear this character of Amy ; for I thought whatever house she might keep, that the heyday of her blood had been over ; but I found that she had not been willing to be taken for an old woman, though near sixty years of age ; and my not seeing or hearing from her for some time past was a confirmation of what had been told me.

I went home sadly dejected, considering how I might hear of her ; I had known her for a faithful servant to me, in all my bad and good fortune, and was sorry that at the last such a miserable end should overtake her, though she, as well as I, deserved it several years before.

A few days after, I went pretty near the place I had heard she was, and hired a poor woman to go and inquire how Amy ——— did, and whether she was likely to do well. The woman returned, and told me that the matron, or mistress, said, the person I inquired after died in a salivation two days before, and was buried the last night in the cemetery belonging to the hospital.

I was very sorry to hear of Amy's unhappy and miserable death ; for when she came first into my service, she was really a sober girl, very witty and brisk, but never impudent, and her notions in general were good, till my forcing her, as it were, to have an intrigue with the jeweller. She had also lived with me between thirty and forty years, in the several stages of life as I had passed through ; and, as I had done nothing but what she was privy to, so she was the best person in the universal world to consult with and take advice from, as my circumstances now were.

I returned to my lodgings much chagrined, and very disconsolate ; for, as I had for several years lived at the pinnacle of splendour and satisfaction, it was a prodigious heart-break to me now to fall from upwards of 3,000*l.* per annum to a poor 500*l.* principal.

A few days after this, I went to see my son, the Earl of Wintelsheim ; he received me in a very courteous (though far from a dutiful) manner ; we talked together near an hour upon general things, but had no particular discourse about my late lord's effects, as I wanted to have. Among other things he told me, that his guardians had advised him to go to the university for four years longer, when he would come of age, and his estate would be somewhat repaired; to which he said he had agreed; and for that purpose, all the household goods and equipages were to be disposed of the next week, and the servants dismissed. I immediately asked if it would be looked upon as an encroachment upon his father's will if I took Isabel (who had been my waiting-maid ever since I came from England) to live with me. No, my lady, very readily replied he, as she will be dismissed from me, she is certainly at liberty and full freedom to do for herself as soon and in the best manner she possibly can. After this I stayed about a quarter of an hour with him, and then I sent for Isabel, to know if she would come and live with me on her dismissal from her lord's. The girl readily consented, for I had always been a good mistress to her; and then I went to my own lodgings in my son's coach, which he had ordered to be got ready to carry me home.

Isabel came, according to appointment, about ten days after, and told me the house was quite cleared both of men and moveables, but said, her lord (meaning my son) was not gone to the university as yet, but was at one of his guardian's houses, where he would stay about a month, and that he intended to make a visit before his departure, which he did, attended by my late chaplain; and I being in handsome lodgings, received them with all the complaisance and love as was possible, telling them, that time and circumstances having greatly varied with me, whatever they saw amiss, I hoped they would be so good as to look over it at that time, by considering the unhappy situation of my affairs.

After this visit was over, and I had myself and Isabel to provide for, handsome lodgings to keep (which were as expensive as they were fine), and nothing but my principal money to live on (I mean what I happened to have in my pocket at my lord's death, for I had not been paid my 500*l.* as yet), I could not manage for a genteel maintenance as I had done some years before. I thought of divers things to lay my small sums out to advantage, but could fix on nothing; for it always happens that when people have but a trifle, they are very dubious in the disposal of it.

Having been long resolving in my mind, I at last fixed on merchandise as the most genteel and profitable of anything else. Accordingly, I went to a merchant who was intimate with my late lord, and letting him know how my circumstances were, he heartily condoled with me, and told me he could help me to a share in two ships, one was going a trading voyage to the coast of Africa, and the other a privateering. I was now in a dilemma, and was willing to have a share in the trader, but was dubious of being concerned in the privateer; for I had heard strange stories told of the gentlemen concerned in that way of business. Nay, I had been told, but with what certainty I cannot aver, that there was a set of men who took upon them to insure ships, and as they always knew to what port they are bound, notice was sent to their correspondent abroad, to order out their privateers on the coast the other sailed, and they knowing the loading, and the numbers of hands and guns were on board, soon made prizes of the vessels, and the profits were equally divided, after paying what was paid for their insurance, among them all.

However, I at last resolved, by the merchant's advice, to have a share in the trader, and the next day he over-persuaded me to have a share in the privateer also. But that I may not lay out my money before I have it, it may not be amiss to observe, that I went to the executors and received my 500*l.* at an hour's notice, and then went to the merchant's to know what the shares would come to, and being told 1,500*l.*, I was resolved to raise the money; so I went home, and, with my maid Isabel, in two days' time disposed of as many of my clothes as fetched me near 1,100*l.*, which, joined to the above sum, I carried to the merchant's, where the writings were drawn, signed, sealed, and delivered to me, in the presence of two witnesses, who went with me for that purpose. The ships were near ready for sailing; the trader was so well manned and armed, as well as the privateer, that the partners would not consent to insure them, and out they both sailed, though from different ports, and I depended on getting a good estate between them.

When I was about this last ship, a letter came from the count, my son, full of tender expressions of his duty to me, in which I was informed, that he was going again to the university at Paris, where he should remain four years; after that, he intended to make the tour of Europe, and then come and settle at the Hague. I returned him thanks in a letter for his compliment, wished him all happiness, and a safe return to Holland, and desired that he would write to me from time to time, that I might hear of his welfare, which was all I could now expect of him. But this was the last time I heard from him, or he from me.

In about a month's time, the news came that the privateer (which sailed under British colours, and was divided into eight shares) had taken a ship, and was bringing it into the Texel, but that it accidentally foundered, and being chained to the privateer, had, in sinking, like to have lost that too. Two or three of the hands got on shore, and came to the Hague; but how terribly I was alarmed, any one may judge, when I heard the ship the privateer had was the Newfoundland, merchantman, as I had bought two shares in out of four. About two months after, news was current about the Hague, of a privateer or merchantman, one of them of the town, though not known which, having an engagement in the Mediterranean, in which action, both the privateer and trader was lost. Soon after, their names were publicly known, and, in the end, my partners heard that they were our ships, and unhappily sailing under false colours (a thing often practised in the time of war), and never having seen each other, had, at meeting, a very smart engagement, each fighting for life and honour, till two unfortunate shots, one of them, viz., the privateer, was sunk by a shot between wind and water, and the trader unhappily blown up by a ball falling in the powder-room; there were only two hands of the trader, and three of the privateer, that escaped, and they all fortunately met at one of the partner's houses, where they confirmed the truth of this melancholy story, and to me a fatal loss.

What was to be done now? I had no money, and but few clothes left, there was no hope of subsistence from my son or his guardians, they were tied down to be spectators of my misfortunes, without affording me any redress, even if they would.

Isabel, though I was now reduced to the last penny, would live with me still, and, as I observed before, and may now repeat, I was in a pretty situation to begin the world; upwards of sixty years of age, friendless, scanty of clothes, and but very little money.

I proposed to Isabel to remove from lodgings, and retire to Amsterdam, where I was not known, and might turn myself into some little way of business, and work for that bread now, which had been too often squandered away upon very trifles. And upon consideration, I found myself in a worse condition than I thought, for I had nothing to recommend me to heaven, either in works or thoughts; had even banished from my mind all the cardinal and moral virtues, and had much more reason to hide myself from the sight of God, if possible, than I had to leave the Hague, that I might not be known of my fellow-creatures. And farther to hasten our removing to Amsterdam, I recollected I was involved in debt, for money to purchase a share in the Newfoundland trader, which was lost, and my creditors daily threatened me with an arrest to make me pay them.

I soon discharged my lodgings, and went with Isabel to Amsterdam, where I thought, as I was advanced in years, to give up all I could raise in the world, and on the sale of everything I had, to go into one of the Proveniers' houses, where I should be settled for life; but as I could not produce money enough for it, I turned it into a coffee-house near the Stadt-house, where I might have done well; but as soon as I was settled, one of my Hague creditors arrested me for a debt of 75*l.*, and I not having a friend in the world of whom to raise the money, was in a shameful condition, carried to the common jail, where poor Isabel followed me with showers of tears, and left me inconsolable for my great misfortunes. Here, without some very unforeseen accident, I shall never go out of it until I am carried to my grave, for which may my much offended God prepare me as soon as possible.

The Continuation of the Life of Roxana, by Isabel Johnson, who had been her waiting-maid, from the time she was thrown into jail to the time of her death.

After my lady, as it was my duty to call her, was thrown into jail for a debt she was unable to pay, she gave her mind wholly up to devotion; whether it was from a thorough sense of her wretched state, or any other reason, I could never learn; but this I may say, that she was a sincere penitent, and in every action had all the behaviour of a Christian; by degrees, all the things she had in the world were sold, and she began to find an inward decay upon her spirits. In this interval she repeated all the passages of her ill spent life to me, and thoroughly repented of every bad action, especially the little value she had for her children, which were honestly born and bred. And having, as she believed, made her peace with God, she died with mere grief, on the 2nd of July, 1742, in the sixty-fifth year of her age, and was decently buried by me in the churchyard belonging to the Lutherans, in the city of Amsterdam.

In the following life of Mrs. CHRISTIAN DAVIES, taken from her own mouth, we may remark examples of uncommon intrepidity but rarely found in the fair sex. By her having been long conversant in the camp, she had lost that softness which heightens the beauty of the fair, and contracted a masculine air and behaviour, which however excusable in her, would hardly be so in any other of her sex.

She was long before her death afflicted with a complication of distempers, as dropsy, scurvy, &c., at length her husband being taken ill, she would sit up with him at nights, by which she contracted a cold that threw her into a continual fever, which carried her off in four days.

She died on the 7th of July, 1739, and was interred in the burying-ground belonging to Chelsea Hospital, with military honours.

THE LIFE AND ENTERTAINING ADVENTURES

MRS. CHRISTIAN DAVIES,

COMMONLY CALLED MOTHER ROSS.

I WAS born in Dublin, in the year 1667, of parents whose probity acquired them that respect from their acquaintance, which they had no claim to from their birth. My father was both a malster and brewer; in which business he employed at least twenty servants, besides those under the direction of my mother, in a farm he hired of Arthur White, of Leslip, Esq.; left entirely to her care. My father was remarkable for industry and vigilance in his affairs, which employing his whole time in town, he never saw my mother but on Sundays, except some extraordinary business required his visiting the farm, which, though of fourscore pounds a year, she managed with great prudence and economy. They were both very tender of me, and spared no cost in my education, though I did not make the best use of their care in this article. I had patience, indeed, to learn to read, and become a good needle-woman, but I had too much mercury in me to like a sedentary life, the reason that I was always at the farm to assist my mother; this I did as much through inclination as duty, being delighted with a country life, it indulging to my love of ramping, and the pleasure I took in manly employments; for I was never better pleased than when I was following the plough, or had a rake, flail, or pitchfork in my hand, which implements I could handle with as much strength and dexterity, if not with more, than any of my mother's servants. I used to get astride upon the horses, and ride them bare-backed about the fields, leaped hedges and ditches, by which I once got a terrible fall, and spoiled a grey mare given to my brother by our grandfather. My father never knew how this mischief happened, which brought me under contribution to a cowherd, who saw me tumble the mare into a dry ditch, and whose secrecy I was obliged to purchase, by giving him, for a considerable time, a cup of ale every night. I shall pass by the wild girlish tricks I and my companions were constantly playing, as they can administer nothing entertaining, and mention one only, to show an odd curiosity in a nobleman. I and four of my companions, were rolling ourselves down a hill, and turning heels over head, when the Earl of C——d was passing in his coach, drawn by six beautiful grey horses, by the road, divided from the scene of our diversion by a quickset hedge and a ditch. He stopped his coach to be a spectator of our gambols; but finding that we put an end to our pastime on our perceiving him (for the youngest of us was seventeen, and consequently had sense enough to think the showing our naked tails not over decent), he called to us, and promising to give us a crown apiece, if we would begin and pursue our diversion; our modesty gave way to our avarice, we indulged his lordship's optics, and he, having been amply satisfied by the unreservedness of our performance, kept his word.

I said that I was as active and strong in all the labours of husbandry, as any of our servants; I will therefore give one instance of this. About the beginning of August, 1685, I was employed to stack wheat, and was on the top of one near fifty-four foot high, when I perceived in the road near our farm, the judges and other magistrates in their robes, preceded by kettle-drums, trumpets, and heralds, in their rich coats, coming up the hill, in order to proclaim King James. Animated by the martial music, and desirous to have a nearer view of this glorious sight, which, with the glare of the gold and silver coats, the heralds, trumpets, and kettle-drums wore, had, in a manner, dazzled my sight, I leaped down, ran to, and cleared with a leap a five-barred gate, which was between me and the road they passed, calling to my mother to come and see the show, as I imagined every man there at least a prince. My mother hearing the procession was to proclaim King James, went back and wept bitterly for some time, but would never tell me the reason for her tears.

Nothing remarkable occurs to my memory from the time of this monarch's being proclaimed, to that in which he was forced to throw himself into the arms of the Irish subjects, having been driven from the throne of England by King William. The Irish very readily espoused his cause, and among others (from a consciousness of its being a duty incumbent on him to support his lawful sovereign, notwithstanding his being of a different religion, which he thought not reason sufficient to affect his loyalty) my father sold all his standing corn, and other things of value, to Mr. Ascham, a neighbouring farmer, and was thus enabled, with what ready money he had by him before, to raise a troop of horse, and provide them with accoutrements, and everything necessary to take the field; and having furnished himself with a fine horse, and whatever else was requisite, he set out at the head of this troop, which was called by his name, Cavanaugh's, to join the rest of the army. I remember I was very fond of riding this horse, for a reason which would have prevented any other of my sex venturing upon him; I mean his mettle; for he was so fiery, that not one of the troop durst mount him. You will perhaps wonder how I could; but I had so often fed him with bread and oats, that he would stand for me to take him up, when at grass, though he would have given twenty men work enough to catch him. When I had once hold of him, I would put on his bridle and lead him into a ditch and bestride him barebacked. I have often mounted him when saddled, and took great pleasure to draw and snap the pistols, and have not seldom made my friends apprehend for my life. I mention this, not as worth notice, but only to show my inclinations, while a girl, were always masculine.

My father having sold his corn standing, as I have already observed, without my mother's knowledge, occasioned a quarrel, in which some of Mr. Ascham's and our men were wounded. After my father was gone to the army, my mother sent reapers into the field to cut the corn; these met with others, sent by the then proprietor, upon the same errand. Words immediately arose, and they very soon came to blows, making use of their sickles, a desperate weapon. The noise soon reached my mother's ears, who understanding how the matter was, withdrew her troops; but not without some difficulty, and having regaled them in her house with a good breakfast and strong liquors, they were at length appeased and dismissed.

While my father bore arms for King James, the neighbouring papists, in time of divine service, came to, and blocked up the church door of Leslip, with butchers' blocks, and other lumber. My mother was then in the church; I was at home, but hearing the noise, and fearing my mother might receive some hurt, I snatched up a spit, and thus armed, sallied forth to force my way, and come to her assistance; but being resisted by a serjeant, I thrust my spit through the calf of his leg, removed the things which had blocked up the door, and called to my mother, bidding her come away, for dinner was ready. In the scuffle, the reverend Mr. Malary, the clerk, with several others, were wounded, and I taken into custody for having hurt the serjeant; but upon being heard, and representing the hardship of being interrupted in our worship, when my father was actually in arms for the service of the prince for whom they pretended great zeal, though in fact, they ought rather to be esteemed his concealed enemies, since, by such actions, they alienated the hearts of his subjects, and gave ground to his enemies to raise a clamour, I was acquitted.

The battle of the Boyne put an end to all my father's hopes for King James; for his army was there defeated, and he, with the rest of the shattered troops, trusted their safety to the swiftness of their horses' heels, rather than to the strength of their own arms. My father, in company with a very handsome young French gentleman, who served as lieutenant in the king's forces, made the best of his way to our house, without staying to bait on the road. My mother, who understood what belonged to good manners, as she had been genteelly educated by her father, Bryan Bembrick, of Wheatly, in the bishopric of Durham, Esq.; who had a particular care to bring up his children in a polite manner, received the stranger with great civility, and having ordered them a hot supper, prepared my bed for his reception that night; but he lay no longer than till three of the morning, when my father, alarmed with the noise of some of his friends who fled from the conquerers, imagining they were the victorious forces of King William, in pursuit of the defeated remains of King James's army, roused the French officer, and got out their horses with the utmost expedition. While they were saddling, my father took a short, but sorrowful leave of his wife and children, whom, with tears in his eyes, he blessed and recommended to the Divine protection: then turning to my mother, My dear, said he, do not be dejected; comfort yourself, that whatever misfortunes befall us, we suffer in a just cause, and for having done what is the duty of every loyal subject; at least, my conscience tells me, that I have acted as I ought, and as I was bound to do by my oath of allegiance, from which I know no power on earth that can absolve me. The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord. His ways are inscrutable, and I humbly submit to his decrees, which are all founded in wisdom. As for you, keep at home with your children, and be their support, for you being a protestant, need apprehend no danger from the enemy; may they hereafter repay your maternal care and tenderness by a filial duty, and prove your comfort; but never torment yourself with uneasy thoughts for your unfortunate husband. Think of me no more. God forbid, said she, and bursting into a flood of tears; my father, who could not bear to see her weep, as he loved her with a sincere tenderness, ran out of the room, and he and the officer mounting their horses, fled with precipitation. My mother was in too great affliction to admit of any rest, and rose immediately; but we, who did not take my father's departure so much to heart, lay till daybreak.

About twelve months after this, we had news of King James's forces, commanded by Monsieur St. Ruth, being defeated at the battle of Aghrim, where General Ginkle obtained a complete victory. In this battle my father was dangerously wounded; though, by the skill of able surgeons, who attended him, he was in a fair way of recovery; but the night before he intended to return to his family, one Kelly, an Irish papist, who served him, taking the advantage of his hurt, and of a dark night, ran away with his horses to General Ginkle's army. This villanous ingratitude from a man whom he had always treated with great humanity, had such an effect on my father, that he was seized with a fever, which carried him off in a short time.

After the battle, in which the French general St. Ruth was killed, the English laid siege to Limerick. Captain Bodeaux, who, after the battle of the Boyne, fled with my father to our house, was here in garrison, and commanded that body of troops which defended the bridge, in which post he behaved with so much gallantry, that he was admired, and his death lamented, by even his enemies, who, to their great surprise, found, on stripping this brave officer, that it was a woman had given such proofs of an invincible courage.

Though my mother had, during my father's illness, procured him a pardon for having appeared in arms, and levied men for the service of King James, yet, notwithstanding, the government seized upon all his effects.

I had, by this time, attained to an age of maturity, and happening to take the eye of a son of my mother's first cousin, named Thomas Howel, whose uncle, on the father's side, was a bishop, himself a student, and fellow of Dublin college, he made warm love to me; and for two years together carried on his addresses: his assiduity, and the opinion I had of his sincerity, were not without effect in his favour; and such that I found my esteem for him greater than my concern for my own interest; for having no fortune to bring him, except a barrel of brass crowns, which King James was not in a condition to pay in silver, I would not consent to his ruin; though he might, as he proposed, support us, by keeping a Latin school. When we eagerly wish a thing, we seldom examine thoroughly the consequences which may attend the possession of what we desire; and, if we cannot help seeing the evils probably consequential of the completion of our wishes, we easily satisfy ourselves with arguments which flatter our inclinations, however weak: this was his case; for when I laid before him the certain poverty which would attend his marrying a woman without a fortune, he removed the objection, at least as to his own part, with the airy prospect of preferments in the church: and in the interim, with what money he could get by a school, sufficient, as he flattered himself, to maintain me like a lady; and when I represented to him the deplorable condition of a clergyman's widow, with, possibly, a number of children; he answered, that his economy should ward against that evil. I, who looked upon all this as a castle in the air, would not consent to what he wished and thought, his happiness, though I could not esteem it other than his undoing, as well as my own ruin; and therefore very seriously begged of him to give over his pursuits, but to no purpose: he still continued his visits and solicitations, which were more frequent, longer, and more urgent than usual. One day he came to see me when I was the only person in the house, and then busied in making the beds; he laid hold of the opportunity, threw himself at my feet, embraced my knees, and urged his suit with such vehemence, such warmth of expression, such tender embraces, such ardent kisses that finding by my eyes, and short breath, I had caught the contagious desire, he added force to vows of eternal constancy and marriage, and, with little resistance on my side, throwing me upon the bed, deprived me of that inestimable jewel which a maiden ought to preserve preferable to life. He stayed not long after his having perpetrated a deed which gave me up a prey to the deepest melancholy; when, on his withdrawing, he gave room for bitter reflection. I repented my weakness; and, with sincere tears of penitence, cursed the time, myself, and the undoer; I raved, tore my hair, and was not far from madness. My mother and the rest of the family stayed abroad till evening; and my reason returning, I endeavoured to compose myself that I might not betray my folly: my eyes being pretty much swollen, my mother took notice of it, and asked me what was the matter; but she received only an evasive answer. I could get no rest all the following night, and the remembrance of what had passed, had such an effect upon me that I lost both my colour and stomach; I hated to see any of my acquaintance, and would, if possible, have hid me from the light of the sun: my melancholy was such, that every one took notice of it, and my afflicted mother, sensibly touched with this sudden change, often tenderly inquired of me what ground I had for the sadness which gave her so much uneasiness: for she feared so sudden and settled a grief, as was impossible for me to dissemble, would endanger my life. She could draw nothing from me, but a request to quit her house; which she readily agreeing to, in hopes a change of air and company might produce also a change in my temper, sent me to my aunt's, who kept a public house in Dublin. Here I often met my student, but so carefully avoided allowing him any opportunity of speaking to me, and took such an inveterate hatred to him, that he at last was sensible his pursuit was vain. My melancholy, after I found no ill-consequence attend our guilt, began to wear off by degrees, and I gradually recovered my colour and cheerfulness of temper. I lived with my aunt upwards of four years, and behaved to her with such dutiful respect, such observance and vigilance, and with such a reserved, yet obliging manner to others, that I entirely captivated her good opinion, and engaged her tenderness; for, at her death, she left me sole heiress to all she had, and in possession of a house well-furnished, and well-accustomed. I now received the reward of my prudent behaviour; I lived in ease and plenty; my business was considerable; I got money apace, and was esteemed by all my neighbours and acquaintance. Never woman was in a happier situation; for I was at the height of my ambition, and had not a wish to make. In a word, I was thoroughly content, and had reason so to be, till love, too often the bane of our sex; love, who has not seldom ruined noble families, nay, destroyed cities, and lain kingdoms waste; envious of the calm I enjoyed, came to imbitter my peace, disturb the tranquillity of my life, and make me know, by experience, the short duration of all sublunary satisfaction. Richard Welsh, a young fellow who had served my aunt, and, after her death, continued in the same capacity with me, found the way to my heart. He was very well made in his person, had a handsome, manly face; was of a generous open temper; sober, vigilant, and active in his business; very regular in his life, and modest in his behaviour. In a word, he was, or appeared to me, a man whom any woman might love without having her good sense called in question. My pride, at first, made me endeavour to stifle this growing passion, and I tried to conquer it by reason. I thought it would be a reflection upon me to marry my servant, and I was sensible that it must be to the disadvantage of my fortune; for though by his economy he had saved some money, yet was it a trifle to what my aunt left me, and which my business was still daily improving: but love and reason seldom agree, and when once that despotic tyrant gets possession of the heart, he will also rule the head: my pride and reason made but vain efforts, and he would listen to neither; the more they disputed, the more absolute the little domineerer grew; in a very little time he humbled my haughtiness, and silenced my reason: the sight of Richard Welsh overturned the strongest resolutions that I could make; his name was music to my ears; if I did not see him, no other object could please my eyes, and I knew no other happiness but in possession of Richard Welsh. Though my pride and reason were thoroughly vanquished, yet my modesty held out; for I thought it indecent, and a reflection on my sex, to make the first overture. This caused me many a restless night, till I thought on an expedient, which was to acquaint one of my friends with my situation, and engage her to put Richard upon making his addresses to me. She found an opportunity of talking to him in private, which she did in the following manner. Richard, I have thought your mistress happy in so trusty and sprightly a servant, who so well understands, and takes such honest care of her business; I know she is very sensible of your deserts, and gives you an excellent character; nay, I have heard her talk of you in such a manner, that between you and me, friend Richard, I fancy she has a sneaking kindness for you, and I believe it would be no hard matter for you to carry her, and be master instead of servant in the house, if you have the courage to make the attack. As I fancy I am not much out in my conjecture, I was resolved to take the first opportunity to acquaint you with your good fortune, if I am not deceived, as I believe I am not; make the best of this advice, and remember the proverb, Faint heart never won fair lady. Richard answered, that he liked his mistress very well, and he had a very good place, which he should be loath to lose, as he was afraid he should, if he made such an attempt, and did not succeed. Believe me, Richard, said my friend, none of us all are displeas'd at being admir'd; we may pretend to be angry; but it is but a cloak to cover the inward satisfaction we find in being capable to inspire love. Your mistress is a woman, young, and not exempt from the failings of her sex: try your fortune with her, and, my life on it, you carry her. Richard thanked her, and promised he would follow her advice, which he did, in such terms as still endeared him more to me. I made, at first, some difficulty to hear him out; and putting on an air of severity, which, however, he might plainly perceive was counterfeit, bid him mind the business of the house as he ought to do, and he would find a cure for his pretended passion, which was the common effect of idleness. Richard catch'd at the words pretended and idleness. My dear mistress, said he, if your modesty would allow you to view yourself with the same impartiality as others look upon you, your glass would convince you, that nobody is more capable to give love, and consequently mine is not pretended, or the effect of idleness, since your own approbation of my diligence frees me from that imputation. No, I love you sincerely; and it is the effect of your agreeable temper. If I have not sooner told you this, it was my fear of displeasing you, and losing my place; for I find so great a pleasure in being near, and seeing you, that I prefer that alone to all the profit, were it ten times as much, of your service; and will rather continue your servant, than accept of being master of the best-accustomed house in Dublin, to lose the satisfaction which I find in the sight of you. Very romantic truly, said I; no doubt you have been studying some book of compliments, and come to practise upon me. There needs no study, replied Richard, to speak the sentiments of my heart; and though your modesty dissembles it, I am certain you must be conscious that it can be no easy matter to see, and converse with you, as I have done, and not be sensible of the effects of so many allurements. Away to your business, cried I; I don't love flattery; and I know too well the character of your sex, to believe a word any one of you utter; for your dissimulation goes hand-in-hand with your profession; I will hear no more; begone, I say, and think you are well off that I don't show more anger, which your former diligence prevents. You can't, answered he, be more severe in your punishment of my faults, than to banish me thus without the least glimpse of hopes. Go, go, said I, repent this impertinence, and, if you can find a plausible excuse, I will give you a hearing at night when the company is gone. O, let me thank you, cried my saucy rogue, for this goodness; and seizing me in his arms, he almost stifled me with kisses. I never before, was so well pleased, though I pretended to be terrible angry, and threatened, if ever he was rude again, I would make him repent it. Faith, my dear mistress, replied he, you have given me such a taste of happiness, that I will undergo any punishment to repeat it; as he indeed instantly did, and I was better pleased, and more angry, and bid him get out of my sight and attend the customers; which, being called upon, he did, not at all frightened with my threats. I went soon after into my bar, where Richard watched my looks, and finding I turned away my head and blushed when I met his eyes, he interpreted it a good omen, and resolved to push his point.

At night, when the company was all gone, notwithstanding my resentment of Richard's rudeness, he had the impudence to come into my chamber, telling the maid he was going to settle some accounts with me. As soon as I saw him, I asked him if he had forgot his late rudeness; for, if he had not, he showed an uncommon assurance, in daring to come into my sight. He replied, he was a servant, and, as he had always obeyed my orders, he should be now wanting to his duty, if he had not come; and that he was resolved never to be, while he had the pleasure of being under my roof. I desired to know what he meant. You gave me order, said he, to come and excuse myself for a fault which I own I can't repent. O, said I, I will rather forgive you without hearing your excuse, than expose myself to the like impertinence. Indeed, my dear mistress, till you are less inviting, I am of opinion, I shall never be cured of my impertinence, though you may, if you please, change that word, and call it, as it really is, a sincere, disinterested fondness, by making your man your husband. I will be still your servant; and, as I have always studied your interest, I shall then study both that, and your happiness; your ease shall be my constant care; and you shall continue as much mistress of what you have, and dispose of it as you now do: for I shall never know any pleasure but that of pleasing you. I answered, that if he could persuade me to believe him, the world must censure me very much to marry my servant, a man without a fortune, when I had enough, and was in a way of business to live easy. To this he answered, that our happiness did not depend on the opinion of the world; for do what we will, we cannot please everybody; that it was more reasonable for me to imagine, I should be happy with a man that loved me, even to doating, and whom I had also engaged by a tie of gratitude, than with one whom I married with a view of interest. That a great many rich people were strangers to that ease and content, which they had reason to envy in many much beneath them in fortune. That for his part, he should slight the censure of the world, were he the master, and I the servant, and, consulting only his own happiness, look upon what he possessed, no farther valuable than as it would prove the sincerity of his love, by making me mistress of it all. He then threw himself on his knees, and grasping mine in a sort of ecstasy, he continued; Believe me, my dear mistress, I have no view of interest; I love you for yourself, not for your money; of which I will never pretend to be other than a just steward, would you consent to make me the happiest man alive. I bid him get up, and as it was late, leave me to go to bed, and I would consider on what he had said. He answered, That I could not expect he could obey such cruel orders, without some consideration. Suffer me to take one kiss, that I may flatter myself I have recovered your favour, and you shall see me all obedience. Well, well, said I, anything to get rid of you. On this, he snatched me in his arms, kissed and embraced me with an ardour that almost took away my senses, as well as my breath, and left my room: he had put me into such an agitation, and I fetched my breath so short and thick, that when I had a little recovered myself, I trembled at the risk I had run, and attributed my not being again surprised, rather to his respect, which prevented the attempt, than to any power I should have had to resist him. This reflection made me resolve not to admit him any more into my chamber till he had a right to do what he pleased, and it would be my duty not to resist him. To be short, he continued his solicitations, and my friend who had put him upon them, pretended to plead on his behalf; I seemed to yield to the strength of her reasons, and we were married in a week after the first declaration. I expected to be censured by all my acquaintance for having married my servant; but I was agreeably disappointed, and they, on the contrary, complimented me upon the prudence of my choice. Richard proved a tender, careful, and obliging husband; and as he promised, left me as much mistress of my effects, as I was when single. Whatever I did was well done, and he never seemed so well pleased, as when he had an opportunity to please me. He neither altered his dress, nor his manner of life; while he was servant he was always tight and clean, which, by the vails he got, besides his wages, he might very well be. When he was master, he bought neither more suits, nor finer cloth; his change of fortune made no change in his temper or behaviour; he was altogether as fearful of giving me the least cause of complaint; was humble to our customers, and, if possible, more active and vigilant in our business. He never forgot himself; and if sometimes gentlemen made him sit down with them, he paid them the same deference, and did not saucily, like too many publicans, imagine their condescension set him upon a foot with them, and gave him a license to talk and behave impertinently. He was remarkable for his sobriety, which, with his modesty, good sense, and entertaining wit, endeared him to the best company that frequented the house. In a word, he had good sense, which he made a proper use of, and never would drown. We lived happily four years without any intervening misfortune; in which time, I brought him two fine boys, and was big of my third child, when the fickle goddess, weary of lavishing on me her favours, turned her back upon me, and resolved to make me sensible that she deserved the epithet of variable.

Alderman Forest, in James-street, furnished us with beer, and my husband went one day thither to pay him 50*l.*; but, to my great surprise, and contrary to custom, he did not return all that day: this gave me some uneasiness, which increased when it was grown entirely dark; but when the night advanced, and I heard no news of him, I concluded he must of necessity be murdered, for the sake of the money he had carried out, and grew quite outrageous. I despatched people every way to find him, but all their endeavours were to no manner of purpose; they heard, indeed, that he had been at the alderman's, and he owned the receipt of the money, but could give no account of him; other than that a gentleman was in his company, when he paid the 50*l.*, and that they went away together. I now concluded (though, as it proved, very unjustly) that the person mentioned to have been with him, had, upon some private pique, murdered him, and conveyed away his body.

My grief for his loss, for all search proved vain, was equal to the tender affection I bore him, and made me unfit to look after my house; the care of which I trusted to a nominal friend, who I found took care of her own interest to the prejudice of mine; for, instead of gaining while she had the management of my affairs, I ran out money. Time having somewhat mollified my grief, and a twelvemonth having elapsed since my husband had disappeared, I bought mourning for myself and children, and took upon me the care of the business.

After having given my dear Richard over for dead, I was surprised by the receipt of a letter from him, which was as follows:—

DEAR CHRISTIAN,

This is the twelfth letter I have sent you without any answer to my former, which would both surprise and very much grieve me, did I not flatter myself that your silence proceeds from the miscarriage of my letters. It is from this opinion that I repeat the account of my sudden and unpremeditated departure, and the reason of my having enlisted for a soldier. It was my misfortune, when I went out to pay the alderman the 50*l.*, to meet Ensign C——m, who, having formerly been my schoolfellow, would accompany me to the alderman's house, from whence we went, at his request, and took a hearty bottle at the tavern, where he paid the reckoning; having got a little too much wine in my head, I was easily persuaded to go on board a vessel that carried recruits, and take a bowl of punch, which I did in the captain's cabin, where being pretty much intoxicated, I was not sensible of what was doing upon deck. In the interim, the wind sprang up fair, the captain set sail with what recruits were on board, and we had so quick a passage, that we reached Helvoet Sluys before I had recovered from the effects of liquor. It is impossible for me to paint the despair I was in, finding myself thus divided from my dear wife and children, landed on a strange shore, without money or friends to support me. I raved, tore my hair, and cursed my drunken folly, which had brought upon me this terrible misfortune, which I thought in vain to remedy by getting a ship to carry me back, but there was none to be found. The ensign, who possibly did not intend me this injury, did all he could to comfort me, and advised me to make a virtue of necessity, and take on in some regiment. My being destitute and unknown, compelled me to follow his advice, though with the greatest reluctance, and I now am, though much against my inclination, a private sentinel in Lord O——y's regiment of foot, where I fear I must pass the remainder of a wretched life, under the deepest affliction for my being deprived of the comfort I enjoyed while blessed with you and my dear babies: if Providence, in his mercy, does not relieve me; the hopes of which, and of once embracing those alone who engross my tenderest affection, you, my dearest Christian, and my poor children, make me endeavour to support my misfortune, and preserve a life, which, without you, would be too miserable to be worth the care of your Unfortunate, but ever loving husband,

RICHARD WELSH.

This letter renewed my grief, and gave new fountains to my eyes. I had bewailed him dead, and now I lamented him living, looking upon his unfortunate situation worse than death, as he was deprived of all means of returning to me; for I despaired of his officers parting with him. When I had read the letter, I was at first stupified; I stood without motion, and my trouble being too great to allow of tears, I gave a sudden shriek and fell down, without the least signs of life remaining in me. When, by the care and charity of my friends and neighbours who came to my assistance, I was brought to my senses and speech, I burst into a flood of tears; but when I was asked the occasion of this sudden grief, I, for some time, answered nothing, but, My dear Richard, O must I never see thee more! O my dear, dear husband! once the comfort of my life, now the source of my misfortunes, I can never support the loss. In a word, I was in such agonies, and fainted so often, that they who were about me almost despaired of my life, or if I survived this new affliction, of which I was not capable to give them an account, that it would be the loss of my senses. Some of my friends would watch with me that night, and had it not been for their care, I had certainly put an end to that life which I thought insupportable. In the getting me to bed, my letter dropped, and their curiosity having taught them the cause of my distracting trouble, they endeavoured to comfort me with the hopes of recovering my husband; but to no purpose, I was inconsolable, and closed not my eyes all that night; in the morning I thought of going in search of my dear Richard, and this gave some ease to my tortured mind. I began to flatter myself that I should meet no great difficulty in finding him out, and resolved in one of his suits, for we were both of a size, to conceal my sex, and go directly for Flanders, in search of him whom I preferred to everything else the world could afford me, which, indeed, had nothing alluring, in comparison with my dear Richard, and whom the hopes of seeing had lessened every danger to which I was going to expose myself. The pleasure I found in the thoughts of once more regaining him, recalled my strength, and I was grown much gayer than I had been at any time in my supposed widowhood. I was not long deliberating, after this thought had possessed me, but immediately set about preparing what was necessary for my ramble; and disposing of my children, my eldest with my mother, and that which was born after my husband's departure, with a nurse (my second son was dead), I told my friends, that I would go to England in search of my husband, and return with all possible expedition after I had found him. My goods I left in the hands of such friends as had spare house room, and my house I let to a cooper. Having thus ordered my affairs, I cut off my hair, and dressed me in a suit of my husband's, having had the precaution to quilt the waistcoat, to preserve my breasts from hurt, which were not large enough to betray my sex, and putting on the wig and hat I had prepared, I went out and bought me a silver-hilted sword, and some Holland shirts: but was at a loss how I should carry my money with me, as it was contrary to law to export above 5*l.* out of the kingdom; I thought at last of quilting it in the waistband of my breeches, and by this method I carried with me fifty guineas without suspicion.

I had now nothing upon my hands to prevent my setting out; wherefore, that I might get as soon as possible to Holland, I went to the sign of the Golden Last, where Ensign Herbert Laurence, who was beating up for recruits, kept his rendezvous. He was in the house at the time I got there, and I offered him my service to go against the French, being desirous to show my zeal for his majesty King William, and my country. The hopes of soon meeting with my husband, added a sprightliness to my looks, which made the officer say, I was a clever brisk young fellow; and having recommended my zeal, he gave me a guinea enlisting money, and a crown to drink the king's health, and ordered me to be enrolled, having told him my name was Christopher Welsh, in Captain Tichbourn's company of foot, in the regiment commanded by the Marquis de Pisare. The lieutenant of our company was Mr. Gardiner, our ensign Mr. Welsh.

We stayed but a short time in Dublin after this, but, with the rest of the recruits, were shipped for Holland, weighed anchor, and soon arrived at Williamstadt, where we landed and marched to Gorcum. Here our regimentals and first mountings were given us. The next day we set out for Gertrudenburg, and proceeded forward to Landen, where we were incorporated in our respective regiments, and then joined the grand army, which was in expectation of a general battle, the enemy being very near within cannon-shot. Having been accustomed to soldiers, when a girl, and delighted with seeing them exercise, I very soon was perfect, and applauded by my officers for my dexterity in going through it.

In a day or two after we arrived at Landen, I was ordered on the night guard, and, by direction of my officer, was posted at the bed-chamber door of the elector of Hanover. Mustapha, a Turk, and valet-de-chambre to his most serene highness, while I was here upon duty, introduced to the elector, a fine, handsome, jolly lady, who was what we call a black beauty; she was dressed in a rich silk, and her gown was tied with ribbons from her breast to her feet. I thought the lady went with a great deal of alacrity, as I believe many more of our sex would visit a sovereign prince with a particular satisfaction; especially if agreeable in his person, as the elector, who then wore his own hair, and the finest I ever saw, really was. When I saw his late majesty, I told him, I remembered him in fine hair of his own, which became him better than that of possibly some lewd women, which he then wore.

Before I was relieved, the French drew nearer to our army, and were engaged by some of the troops of the allies; I heard the cannon play, and the small shot rattle about me, which at first threw me into a sort of panic, having not been used to such rough music: however, I recovered from my fear, and being ordered by Lord Cholmondeley to repair instantly to my regiment, as I was going, I received a wound from a musket ball, which grazed on my leg a little above the ankle, but did not hurt the bone. Lord Cholmondeley was present, and expressed his concern for my wound in very humane terms, ordering me at the same time to be carried off the field.

A short account of this battle may not be disagreeable to my readers, since it is possible they will nowhere find one more impartial: that given by the French, being too vain, and the relations we have from the English writers, lessening too much the loss we there sustained.

The duke of Luxemburg having invested Huy, the 18th of July, 1693, King William, to make a diversion, detached the Prince of Wirtemberg with twenty battalions and forty squadrons, which forced the French lines in Flanders, and put the country under contribution. This detachment, and another the king had sent off to cover Liege, greatly weakened our army. Luxemburg, who had just carried Huy, laid hold on so favourable an opportunity, and drawing together all his forces, as if he had a design upon Liege, on the 28th, about four in the afternoon presented himself before the allies, who being sensible that they were much the weaker, had posted themselves between the Geete and the brook of Landen. The fatigue of a long march, and the day being so far spent, made him defer the battle to the next day; but this delay gave King William an opportunity to have secured his troops, by retiring in the night to Zoutleeuw, but his majesty rather choosing to wait the enemy, fortified the front of his camp, guarded all the passes, placed his cannon to the greatest advantage, and in a word, took all possible precaution to give the French general a warm reception.

At four the next morning the French advanced in good order, within cannon-shot of our intrenchments, that they might have time to raise their batteries; after which, the battle began at the village of Laar, with the left wing of our army, where a terrible slaughter was made. The foot, which were posted behind the intrenchments, suffered the enemy to advance very near to our cannon, and then firing upon them, covered the field with dead bodies, and swept down whole battalions which lay dead in the same ranks and order as they advanced. The French, notwithstanding, made two vigorous attacks, but did not get an inch of ground upon us, and their obstinacy only augmenting their loss, they gave over on that side about eleven o'clock, but it was to begin again with equal violence with our right wing, which was posted at the village of Neerlanden. The enemy here met with the same reception, and being repulsed, they made so considerable a movement backwards, that we thought them quite dispirited, and sick of the undertaking; but they, leaving some troops to keep the main body and our left in play, marched with the major part of their forces, and their cannon to the village Laar, to make one more attack upon our left wing, which was both more vigorous and bloody than the two preceding. The allies defended themselves with equal bravery, till borne down by numbers, they were forced to abandon the village Laar, and the ground between the intrenchment and the brook. The French horse having by this advantage an opportunity to extend themselves, trod under foot all that opposed their passage, and fell upon the rear of the infantry which defended the trenches. As it was now impossible to drive them out of the post they had won, King William, seeing all efforts vain, ordered the retreat to be sounded. Some few corps retreated in good order, and without confusion, which were mostly Dutch, but the rest took to flight in such disorder and precipitation, that the bridge broke down, and the enemy made bloody havoc of us; whole regiments threw themselves into the Geete, to gain the opposite side, and such numbers were drowned, that their bodies made a bridge for their flying companions, and saved them from the fury of the conquerors. The king, indeed, lost the battle with about sixteen thousand men, the French, say twenty thousand, seventy-six cannon, and ninety colours, but he lost nothing in point of reputation. For Lewis XIV. could not help giving him the praise of a great general and brave prince, saying, that Luxemburg had, indeed, attacked like a prince of Condé; but, that the Prince of Orange had made his retreat like a Marshal Turenne; and the prince of Conti, in a letter he wrote to his princess, said, that King William exposing himself with such heroic bravery as he did in this battle, deserved the quiet possession of a crown which he wore with so much glory; and, indeed, the king not only performed the part of a general, but even of a subaltern officer, for he alighted no less than four times to lead on the foot to the attack; and was at the head of the squadron, commanded by Lord Galway, in the hottest part of the battle; he had two led horses killed by him, and a musket-ball went through his sash. It is true, on account of my wound, I could not be an eyewitness of what I have related; but as I was in the army, on the spot, I had it from those who were.

I was two months incapable of service; after which I joined my regiment, which was under cover the remaining part of the summer, and at the approach of winter was ordered into quarters at Gertrudenburg.

While I stayed here, the dikes near the town were ruined by worms, and a village near our quarters was drowned. As the repairing the damaged dikes required the utmost expedition, the English soldiers were commanded to assist the Dutch, and we were obliged to work day and night up to our waists in water, till they were repaired. Lieutenant Gardiner and I staying, the last time we were at the work, somewhat too long, being resolved to see everything secure, narrowly escaped drowning by the tide coming upon us; however, we supported each other, and waded out hand-in-hand, long after the others had gone off.

The following summer was spent in marches and counter-marches to watch the motion of the French. During this peaceful campaign, as we were foraging, the French came unexpectedly upon, and took three-score of us prisoners, stripped us, and, by very tiresome marches, conducted us to St. Germain's en lay. The first night, the Dutch and English were promiscuously imprisoned, but the next day King James's queen caused the English to be separated, to have clean straw every night, while the Dutch had none, and allowed us five farthings a day per head, for tobacco, a whole pound of bread, and a pint of wine a day for each man; and, moreover, ordered our clothes to be returned us. The other prisoners had but half a pound of bread a day, drank water, and lay almost naked, in filthy dark prisons, without other support. The Duke of Berwick frequently came to see that we were well used, and not defrauded of our allowance. He advised us to take on in the French service, as seven of the English did; he spoke to me in particular; I answered, that I had taken an oath already to King William, and if there was no crime in breaking it, as I was satisfied it was one of the blackest dye, I could not in honour break my engagement, nothing in my opinion being more unbecoming an honest man and a soldier, than to break even his word once given, and to wear a double face. He seemed to applaud my principles, and only added, that if I had accepted conditions, I should have been well used; but the choice depended entirely on me.

Captain Cavanaugh, who was my first cousin, and an officer in the French troops, often came to the prison, and I was at first apprehensive of his knowing me ; but afterwards, had an inclination to discover myself to him, as I certainly had done had my husband been dead, or had I found him ; but my fear of such a discovery being an impediment to the search of my husband, got the better of my inclination.

In about nine days after our imprisonment, Mr. Van-Dedan, a trumpeter, and now living in Chelsea, came to exchange us against some French prisoners, and we were set at liberty ; after which, as it was a duty incumbent on us, we went to the palace to return her majesty grateful thanks for the good offices she had done us, and, indeed, we were greatly indebted to her charity. She had the condescension to see us : she told me, I was a pretty young fellow, and it grieved her much that I had not my liberty sooner.

At our return to the army, we heard the melancholy news of the death of Queen Mary, on which our drums, and colours, &c., were put into mourning, and we soon after drew off into winter-quarters. I was in Gorcum, where my grief for my husband being drowned in the hopes of finding him, I indulged in the natural gaiety of my temper, and lived very merrily. In my frolics, to kill time, I made my addresses to a burgher's daughter, who was young and pretty. As I had formerly had a great many fine things said to myself, I was at no loss in the amorous dialect ; I ran over all the tender nonsense (which I look upon the lover's heavy cannon, as it does the greatest execution with raw girls) employed on such attacks ; I squeezed her hand, whenever I could get an opportunity : sighed often, when in her company : looked foolishly, and practised upon her all the ridiculous airs which I had often laughed at, when they were used as snares against myself. When I afterwards reflected on this unjust way of amusement, I heartily repented it ; for it had an effect I did not wish ; the poor girl grew really fond of me, and uneasy when I was absent : for which she never failed chiding me if it was but for half a day. When I was with her, she always regaled me in the best manner she could, and nothing was too good or too dear to treat me with, if she could compass it ; but notwithstanding a declared passion for me, I found her nicely virtuous ; for when I pretended to take an indecent freedom with her, she told me, that she supposed her tenderness for me was become irksome, since I took a method to change it into hatred. It was true, that she did not scruple to own she loved me as her life, because she thought her inclination justifiable, as well as lawful ; but then she loved her virtue better than she did her life. If I had dishonourable designs upon her, I was not the man she loved ; she was mistaken, and had found the ruffian, instead of the tender husband she hoped in me.

I own this rebuff gained my heart ; and taking her in my arms, I told her, that she had heightened the power of her charms by her virtue ; for which I should hold her in greater esteem, but could not love her better, as she had already engrossed all my tenderness ; and, indeed, I was now fond of the girl, though mine, you know, could not go beyond a platonic love. In the course of this amour, a serjeant of our regiment, but not of the company I belonged to, sat down before the citadel of her heart, and made regular approaches, which cost him a number of sighs, and a great deal of time ; but finding I commanded there, and it was impossible to take it by a regular siege, he resolved to give a desperate assault, sword in hand. One day, therefore, while I was under arms, he came to her, and without any previous indication of his design, a fair opportunity offering, he very bravely, and like a man of honour, employed force to obtain what he could not get by assiduity. The girl defended herself stoutly, and in the scuffle she lost her cap, and her clothes were most of them torn off her back ; but notwithstanding her resolute defence, he had carried the fortress by storm, had not some of the neighbours opportunely come in to her assistance, alarmed by her shrieks, and made him retreat in a very shameful manner.

No sooner had she recovered, and dressed herself, than she went in search of, and found me, in my rank, standing to my arms. She told me what had passed, and begged me to revenge the insult offered her. I was so irritated at this account, that I could hardly contain myself : I was seized with a tremor all over my body ; often changed colour, and, had I not been prevented by my duty, I should that instant have sought and killed him. However, I stifled my resentment till I was dismissed by the officer, and then went in quest of my rival, whom having found, I surlily asked, how he durst attempt the honour of a woman, who was, for aught he knew, my wife ; to whom he was sensible I had long made honourable love. I told him, the action in itself was so base, that it made him unworthy of the king's cloth, which he wore, and ought to be the quarrel of every man in the regiment, as it cast a reflection on the whole corps; but as I was principally concerned in this insult, so I was sufficient to chastise his impudence, and required immediate satisfaction for the affront. He answered me, that I was a proud, prodigal coxcomb. I leave, said I, Billingsgate language to women and cowards; I am not come to a tongue battle, Mr. Serjeant, but to exact a reparation of honour. If you have as much courage in the face of a man, as you have in assaulting defenceless women, go with me instantly to that windmill (which I pointed to), and I will soon convince you, that General T——n had too good an opinion of you, when he took his livery off your back to put on the king's, and gave you a halberd. The fellow had been footman to General T——n, and this reproach stinging him to the quick, he only told me he would soon cool my courage; and we went together to the windmill, where we both drew. I was so irritated at the ill-usage of my sweetheart, and the affront put upon me in her person, that I thought of nothing but putting the villain out of the world. We both drew, and the first thrust I made, gave him a slant wound in his right pap, which had well nigh done his business. He returned this with a long gash on my right arm (for his sword was both for cutting and thrusting, as all soldier's swords are; I fought with that I had purchased in Dublin), but before he could recover his guard, I gave him a thrust in the right thigh. about half a span from the pope's eye; the next pass, he aimed at my breast, but hit my right arm; though it was little more than a small prick of a pin, he being feeble with the loss of blood which flowed plentifully from his wounds. By this time some soldiers on duty having seen our first attack, a file of musketeers, under the command of a serjeant, came up, took us prisoners, disarmed both, and sent him directly to the hospital, and, as my wounds were slight, as I was the aggressor, and beside, a common soldier, conducted me to prison, for the serjeant was thought mortally wounded, and did not recover of a considerable time. I sent my sweetheart an account of what had happened, and where I then was. She acquainted her father with the villanous attempt which the serjeant had made upon her, and let him know it was her quarrel, which I had taken up, was the cause of my confinement. The good burgher made a proper representation of the affront offered his family, and found means, in four days' time to procure me a pardon from King William, an order to release me immediately; to return me my sword, pay my arrears, and give me my discharge from the regiment; all which were punctually performed. The minute I was enlarged, I went to thank my deliverer for my liberty; she, on her side, as gratefully acknowledged my risking my life in revenging the insult done her. She expressed herself with great tenderness, and told me, that when she heard of my imprisonment, she heartily repented her having acquainted me with the serjeant's villanous attempt; blamed herself for having exposed me to so great a danger, and wished she had buried the action in silence. She proceeded, It had been prudent in me, for the sake of both; for you would not have ventured your life, and I should not have given the ill-natured part of the world any ground to censure my conduct; for what interpretation may it not make of your being warm in my cause? This consideration makes me throw off the restraint our sex lies under, and propose to you what I have expected from you, the screening my honour by our marriage. My dear, said I, you offer me the greatest happiness this world can afford me; will you give me leave to ask you of your father? My father! cried she; you cannot imagine a rich burgher will give his daughter to a foot-soldier; for though I think you merit everything, yet my father will not view you with my eyes. This answer I expected, and, indeed, my being very sure that her father would not consent, was the reason why I proposed speaking to him. I asked her, since she imagined her father would be averse to my happiness, what could be done? I will, said she, run the hazard of your fortune, in case my father proves irreconcilable after our marriage. My dear life, said I, here are two obstacles to such a proposal, which are, with me, insuperable. How could I bear to see you deserted by your father, deprived of a fortune, and stripped of all the comforts of life, exposed to hardships and insults, to which women who follow a camp are liable? And how can I, with honour, consent to bring your father's grey hairs to the grave in sorrow, by robbing him of a daughter whom he tenderly loves, by way of return for having procured my liberty? No my charmer, though I am no more than a common sentinel, this breast is capable of as much tenderness, and contains as much honour as that of a general. No, I can neither be so inhuman to you, nor so unjust to your parent. But, as I shall know no satisfaction in life, if deprived of you, it will animate me to such actions, as shall either raise me to a rank that your father need not be ashamed of my alliance, or shall put an end to a life, which must be miserable without you, The sword, my dear, ennobles, and I don't despair of a commission, as I have some reputation in the army, many friends, and am not destitute of money. I think it more becoming the character of a soldier to gain a commission by his bravery, than to purchase one with money; but my desire to call you mine, will make me, at any rate, endeavour to deserve you, and I will, if possible, purchase a pair of colours.

I have heard, said she, that love and reason are incompatible; this maxim is either false, or you are not the ardent lover you profess yourself. However, I relish your proposal of buying a commission, and if your money falls short, let me know it.

You call, said I the ardour of my passion in question, because I love you for yourself; I wish to make you, if possible, as happy in our union as I shall be; while most other men have their own satisfaction alone in view, when they address the fair sex. I accept your offer with a grateful sense of the obligation; but hope I need not put you to the proof of your friendship, without some misfortune should deprive me of what I have by me.

Thus I got off from this amour without loss of credit. As I was discharged from my regiment, and loath to break into my capital stock, which would not long maintain me, I entered with Lieutenant Keith, in Lord John Hayes's regiment of dragoons: for my discharge from my regiment was a favour done me, lest the serjeant, by being an officer, and in favour with his quondam master, might do me some private injury: it was not a discharge from the service.

I went to, and stayed in, my lieutenant's quarters, till the season for action came on; when we were all ordered to the siege of Namur.

The army was now more numerous than it had been any preceding campaign; the major part were encamped at Deinse, and seemed to intend an attack upon the French lines, which were in those quarters; this feint, and the Duke of Wirtemberg's assaulting Fort Knoque, drawing most of the French forces on that side, King William, with the greatest expedition, invested Namur, which they had no notion he would sit down before. This motion, however, could not be made with speed enough to prevent Marshal Boufflers from throwing himself into the town with seven regiments, which augmented the garrison to about fourteen thousand effective men. This did not deter the king from prosecuting his design, leaving only thirty thousand men under the command of Prince Vaudemont, to observe the motion of the French, and cover Flanders. The enemy being well informed of this disposition of the army which was encamped at Woutergen, resolved to attack it in front and flank. The prince making a show of waiting for them, sent his baggage to Ghent, intrenched his camp, placed cannon in all the passes, and taking advantage of the night to prepare for his retreat, made it in the sight of the enemy's army, which advanced to cut him in pieces. The prince had given out such good orders, that all the attacks of the French proved fruitless, and he had the honour of making a glorious retreat, in spite of the enemy, without sustaining any loss. This retreat of Prince Vaudemont is talked of, not only to the present time, but will be admired and looked upon as a master stroke in ages to come.

He soon after gave a new proof of his martial skill and conduct, in defeating the design which Marshall Villeroy had formed of besieging Nieuport; but the marshal revenged himself on Dixmude and Deinse; the governors of which places wanted courage to defend them, which puts me in mind of a proverb, that it is better to have a lion at the head of an army of sheep, than a sheep at the head of an army of lions.

The king opened the trenches before Namur, in two different places, on the 13th of July, 1695, and without giving himself any pain about the loss of Dixmude and Deinse, he gave so many assaults to the town, one on the neck of another, and in every assault sent such a number of forces, that they seemed rather small armies than detachments.

The town capitulated on the 4th of August, but the French, to save the citadel, bombarded Brussels; the effect this had, was only making the allies redouble their efforts at Namur. Never was a more terrible fire seen; for no less than sixty large battering-pieces, and as many mortars, played incessantly on the outworks, which rose one above another in form of an amphitheatre. Marshal Villeroy, judging very rightly that the citadel could not hold out long, though defended by a marshal of France, and a numerous garrison, and finding his bombarding of Brussels could not draw off the king, resolved to attack him in his lines, to save the castle, if possible; to this end, ordering several days' provisions for his troops, he began his march in a continual rain, and passing by Gemblours, encamped at Saunier, stretching his right towards Conroy, and his left on the side of Granlez. Prince Vaudemont, with the army under his command, had left Brussels, before this motion of the French, to cover the siege; and being joined by some detachments, which had occupied several posts, under the command of the Duke of Wirtemberg and the Earl of Athlone, he extended his forces behind Mehaigne, as far as from St. Denis to Ipiigny,

The French finding him so strongly intrenched that it was impracticable to attack him, turned off to the left, and going up the Mehaigne, took post on the bank of that river, at Grandrosiers, between the villages of Peruwes and Ramillies; which obliged the allies to advance on the other side as far as Ostin to dispute the passage. As Villeroy was under a necessity to pass the river to succour the besieged, he came very near to us to reconnoitre, and attempted several times to pass, but did not succeed. On this he called a council of war, and gave all the officers liberty to speak their sentiments freely on the means necessary to be taken to succour the citadel. They unanimously declared the thing impossible, and that it would be rash to attempt it.

In the interim, the allies detached thirty squadrons, commanded by Monsieur de la Forêt, who advanced within pistol-shot of the enemy, to reconnoitre. These were discovered by the French scouts, who fell upon them, and, finding they gave way, suffered themselves to be decoyed into an ambush, where the fight renewing with greater fury, the assailants were driven back towards their camp, after they had lost a hundred and fifty horse. After this skirmish, the marshall seeing no likelihood of passing the Mehaigne, or of succouring the citadel, raised his camp, and took post with his army between Chatelet and Charleroy,

Before this retreat of the marshal, most of the fortifications of Namur were demolished, and the breaches made were large enough for a battalion to mount in front; wherefore orders were given for an assault, which was begun on the 30th of August, after the batteries had played with greater fury than ever, from break of day to one and a half afternoon. My Lord Cuts, with three thousand English, was commanded to assault the new castle. Count Rivera, with two thousand Dutch and a thousand Bavarians, was ordered to attack on the side of Fort Koehoorn, while Monsieur la Cave should assault it in front. At the same instant Monsieur Schwerin, at the head of two thousand men, was to assault the covered way before the Devil's House; and to prevent sallies, a colonel, with five hundred men, was posted between the new castle and Fort Koehoorn. The signal being given, those troops marched to the assault with incredible intrepidity. Here our brave English were drawn into a fatal mistake by their courage; for three hundred of them mounted the breach of the new castle with such impetuosity, that they could not be supported; by this ardour we failed in the attack of that work. The other assault proved more successful. We carried all the covered way of the Devil's House, and that of Fort Koehoorn. Here we made our lodgments, which being joined, we were masters of three thousand yards of covered way.

Notwithstanding we lost a thousand men in this assault, and had as many wounded, the king was preparing for a second; but Marshal Boufflers, not thinking it expedient to give him the trouble, beat the chamade. Hostages being exchanged, the articles were agreed upon, and the allies took possession, on the evening of the 1st of September, of Fort Koehoorn, some works on that side, and of the breach of the new castle.

On the 5th, the garrison, which still consisted of five thousand one hundred and sixty-eight men, marched out at the breach, with drums beating, matches lighted, colours flying, six pieces of canon and two mortars, through a lane of thirty battalions of our troops.

The king of France having not only refused to ransom the garrisons of Deinse and Dixmude, but even sent them towards the frontiers of Spain; King William by way of reprisal, when Marshal Boufflers came out at the head of the light horse, ordered him to be arrested and carried back into the town; where he was told, that if he would give his word that those garrisons should be released, he was at liberty. Upon his refusal, he was conducted to Maestricht, where he was nobly entertained during the time of his confinement, which was but short; for the king, his master, permitting him to promise that those prisoners should be released, he was set at liberty, and conducted by a detachment of two hundred dragoons to Dinant.

After the taking Namur, I went into winter-quarters at the Boss, where a very odd adventure befel me. I went with two of my comrades to a house of civil recreation, where they made a bargain for, and retired with, such ware as they wanted, and I diverted myself with serenading them on the tongs and key. A lady of civil conversation, who was very big, happened to take a liking to me, and used all the common methods of those virtuous damsels to entice me; but finding they had no effect, she swore she would revenge the slight, which she soon after did, by swearing me the father of her child. Whether this was the effect of her revenge, or her judgment, as I made a better figure than any private dragoon in our regiment, and she thought me the best able to provide for her in her month, and to take care of her bastard, is what I won't take upon me to determine; but I was so surprised and enraged at the impudent perjury, that I was almost tempted to disprove her effectually, and give her up to the law; but, on a mature deliberation, I thought it better to defray the charge, and keep the child, which I did; but it died in a month, and delivered me from that expense, though it left me the reputation of being a father, till my sex was discovered.

As nothing remarkable happened to me from this time, to the signing of the peace, it may not be ungrateful to give some memoirs of what passed in the interim in Flanders, where I continued in the same regiment till the army was disbanded.

King William arrived in Holland on the 17th of May, 1696, with design to open the campaign in the Low Countries. The army being thus disposed, a part of the Dutch troops were drawn together near Tirlemont, under the command of Prince Nassau-Sarbruck, field-marshal of the States, who, conjointly with the elector of Bavaria, was to observe the French forces encamped at Fleuris. The other part of the Dutch army, under the command of Prince Vaudemont, was posted at Destelberg, near Ghent, to oppose Marshal Villeroy, who, with part of the French army, had encamped at Deinse. The king joined the Prince of Vaudemont's army in the beginning of June, and having taken a general review on the 7th, he ordered several forts to be raised on the ways to Marikerque and Nieuport, to cover the canal on that side. In the mean while, the troops of Liege and Brandenburg being arrived at the camp of Tirlemont, this body of the army marched on the side of Brussels, stretching the right as far as Limale, and the left to Otterburg. King William, joined with some troops, after having encamped on the plain of Corbais from the 18th of June to the 7th of July, marched directly towards Noirmont and Gemblours. All these motions were both to observe the French, and to have the conveniences, for a considerable part of the campaign, to subsist the army from Brussels.

All this while Marshal Villeroy remained quiet in his camp, near Deinse, between the Scheld and the Lys; and, having extended his left along this small river, and his right towards Cruyshouten, within two leagues and a half of Oudenard, he secured the forage, and maintained a considerable part of his troops at the expense of the enemy: so that King William finding nothing could be done, he sent back the German troops commanded by the Landgrave of Hesse, went to Mecklin, and from thence to Loo.

The King of France, whose subjects were miserably harassed, had some time before made propositions of peace to the allies, of whom the Duke of Savoy was considerably the least powerful, yet having so great a support, he was the most formidable, because the French provinces bordering on his country, having no strong towns, were exposed to an invasion. This made Lewis of opinion, that he ought, at any price, to clap up a peace with this prince; wherefore, he covertly offered to give him Pignerol; restore all the conquests he had made upon him in the course of the war, and, to strengthen their union, to marry his grandson, the Duke of Burgundy, to Mary Adelaide, the Duke of Savoy's daughter. These offers were so very advantageous, that they staggered the duke; however, the reproachful shame which must necessarily have been the consequence of his breaking through solemn engagements, by which he had obtained immense sums from the States-general, and other allies, made him, for some time, hold out against the temptation: but France, always productive of expedients, soon furnished him with a plausible pretence. She acted on the defensive only in Catalonia, Germany, and the Low Countries, that she might turn the greater part of her forces upon Savoy. On the 15th of May, N. S., this same year, Marshal de Catinat entered Piedmont, and pushing forward into the country, came to Rivalta on the 2nd of June. This place is but two leagues' distance from Turin. The duke, upon his approach, cut down the trees, armed all the peasants, and drew the auxiliary troops out of his garrisons, as if he had designed to oppose the enemy. Notwithstanding all these preparations for a vigorous defence, no hostilities were committed on either side. At length, the proclaiming a suspension of arms for thirty days discovered the mystery of this inactivity, which caused the surprise of every one of the allies. This truce was twice renewed, and at length attended by a treaty of peace, proclaimed in Paris on the 10th of September. At the same time that Lewis XIV. was carrying on his intrigue with Savoy, he made advantageous offers to King William and the States, to which the latter began to listen. In a word, a congress was opened on the 9th of May, 1697, N. S., at Ryswick.

Notwithstanding the conferences for the pacification of Europe were carried on in Holland, there was no suspension of arms; for, on the 16th of May, the French besieged Ath, a town in Hainault. King William being arrived from England, immediately went to the army of the allies; we were no less than a hundred thousand effective men, whom he headed, and marched to St. Quentin Lennich, where a body of eleven thousand Germans were ordered to join us, to save Ath, if possible; but the besiegers were so well intrenched, and covered by two armies under the command of Boufflers and Villars, that we could not force them without visible danger, and exposing Brussels to a second bombardment.

These obstacles obliging King William to withdraw with a part of the army to Gemblours, and the Elector of Bavaria, with the other to Deirse, Ath surrendered on the 1st of June, N. S.

The conferences at Ryswick ended in peace, which was signed by the deputies of the States in conjunction with King William, and by the French plenipotentiaries, on the 20th of September. The King of England ratified this peace on the 25th. It was proclaimed in Paris the 23rd of October, and in London on the 28th, O. S.

The King of England having reviewed the army on the plain of Breda, we were disbanded, and I set out for the Brill, took my passage on board a ship bound for, and arrived safe in Dublin. On inquiry, I found my mother, children, and friends, wanted neither health, nor the necessaries of life. I found means to converse with them; but I was so much altered by my dress, and the fatigues I had undergone, that not one of them knew me, which I was not sorry for. The demand the nurse had upon me, on account of my youngest child, being greater than suited with my circumstances to discharge, I resolved to remain incog.

I was not long easy in this indolent way of life, which must soon have drained my purse, wherefore I sought for employment, and found means to support myself, while in Dublin, without breaking into my capital (which I had hitherto husbanded with great economy), till the death of the King of Spain, on the 31st of October, 1700; his having in his will declared, through the intrigues of Cardinal Portocarrero, the Duke of Anjou his successor; and his immediately taking possession of those kingdoms, alarmed all the powers of Europe; and the King of France having acknowledged the Prince of Wales King of England, on the death of his father, which happened at St. Germain on the 16th of September, N. S., 1701, grossly affronting King William, seemed to be the harbingers of a new war, as indeed they proved; for it could not be supposed that the emperor would tamely cede his right. Hostilities were begun in Italy; which prince Eugene entered in May, 1701, at the head of twenty thousand men; beat the French and Savoyards, who guarded the passage of the Adige, from their posts, and passed the river.

Though none of the powers had declared war, the Hollanders drew together their troops near Rosendaal, under the command of the Earl of Athlone; and the imperialists, commanded by Prince Nassau Sarbruch, generalissimo of the emperor, re-enforced by some Dutch troops, besieged Keisersweert.

This news of a war awakened my martial inclination.

I was not long considering what party to take; but immediately took shipping for Holland, and finding my quondam Lieutenant Keith, I enlisted with him in my old corps, the regiment of dragoons, under the command of Lord John Hayes.

The first action I was in, was that of Nimeguen, where we were very roughly handled by the French. As this, which deserves rather to be called a battle than an action, would have ruined all the schemes of the allies, had we lost it, I shall give the best account of it I am capable; to do which, I must return to the siege of Keisersweert.

This town, which was very strongly fortified, the Germans invested on the 16th of April, 1702, N. S. The Prussians took post above, and the Dutch below the town, and each of these troops on their respective sides broke ground on the 18th. At the first advice which was given Marshal Boufflers of this siege, he passed the Maes, near Stevensweert, with design to surprise a body of Dutch troops under the command of Count Tilly: but that general being informed of the march of the French, sent all his heavy baggage to Emerick, went to, and encamped at Ebber, within a league of Cleves, where the Earl of Athlone joined him with the rest of the army belonging to the States-general; so that Monsieur Boufflers' design proved abortive. The Count de Tallard proved more successful in his, which he entered upon a few days after. He took post over against Keisersweert, on the banks of the Rhine; and thus, not only kept open a communication with the town by water, but galled the besiegers so much with his cannon, that they were obliged to quit their works, contract their quarters, and begin new attacks, out of the reach of his cannon. During this siege, the Duke of Burgundy arrived at the French army, to take upon him the command in chief.

Soon after the arrival of this prince, Marshal Boufflers, concluding that the town would not hold out long, resolved to make a diversion to save it. This was to surprise Nimeguen. After having lain some few days quiet in his camp, to give the Count de Tallard, and other forces, time to join him, he decamped from Santin, the 10th of June, and marched immediately to Keeverdonk; from whence he marched between Goch and Gennep, designing to continue his route between Mook and Nimeguen, and to fall upon the Earl of Athlone, who was encamped at Clarenbeek, in hopes the confusion that would attend such an unexpected attack, would afford a fair opportunity to surprise Nimeguen. But the earl having had information of his march, sent away, with all speed, his artillery and heavy baggage, and detached the Duke of Wirtemberg with some troops to take possession of the higher grounds and passes in the neighbourhood of Mook, while he followed with the rest of the army. In coming to the post which he was to defend, the duke discovered the vanguard of the enemy. He diverted them by a retreating fight, till the Earl of Athlone came up to sustain him with the rest of the Dutch army: notwithstanding which, the two enemy armies, in continually skirmishing, made towards Nimeguen; and the French mixing with the Dutch, some of them got, with the latter, into a few of the outworks, and hoped, in the confusion, to push into the town. Everything seemed to favour their design; for there were no cannon planted on the ramparts; the magazines were locked up, the keys were not to be found, and those who had the care of them, were absent. I remember it was upon a Sunday, and in sermon time. The burghers taking the alarm, took to their arms, broke open the magazines, and drew out the cannon, which they mounted and played upon the French. The fire between the two armies, which advanced with equal pace towards the town, was all this while very hot. The French having placed some cannon on a rising ground, made terrible havoc among the Dutch horse, and seized on one of the fortifications called Kykindeport; but a detachment of the Dutch guards, favoured by eight pieces of cannon, which the burghers fired upon the French, soon dislodged them.

Marshal Boufflers, who did not expect so stout a defence, finding his project fail, retreated about two o'clock in the afternoon.

In the interim, the siege of Keisersweert, was vigorously and successfully pushed on; and the governor, after having bravely defended the town thirty days, on the 15th of June capitulated. The garrison was conducted to Venlo with all marks of honour.

That I might not break in upon the account of this battle, and the siege of Keisersweert, I made no mention of myself, and of a particular event. About the middle of the siege, a party of horse and dragoons were detached from the army, under the command of Major-general Dompre: I was in the detachment. We fell in with a superior number of the French cavalry, and put them to the run, with a considerable loss on their, and very little on our, side. I had here the good fortune, though in the thickest of the engagement, to escape without hurt, and to be taken notice of by the officers.

Soon after the surrender of Keisersweert, the Prussian troops joined the grand army, and the Earl of Marlborough, about the same time, arrived with those sent by the Queen of England.

After several motions, in which we could never draw the French to a battle, a detachment invested the town and citadel of Venlo, on the 29th of August, in the night. The horse being not employed in, we covered the siege, and were sometimes sent out to forage. The poor peasants fled before us, and leaving their implements of husbandry in the field, my horse trod on a scythe, and was cut in so dangerous a manner, that I despaired of his recovery; though he at length was again fit for service.

Six days after the trenches had been opened before this town, we assaulted the citadel, and with such success, that after we had carried the covered way, we took it; which obliged the town to capitulate on the 23rd of September.

Stevensweert and Ruremonde were next invested and bombarded, one after another. The former of these bore our fire but two days, the latter three.

The taking all these places, clearing the Maes of the French garrisons as far as Maestricht, their army retired within their lines, and the allies, on the 14th of October, 1702, appeared before Liege. At our approach the French withdrew into the castles: the deputies of the chapter, and of the magistracy, on the same day agreed on a capitulation with the Earl of Marlborough, and the commissioners of the States-general, for the principality of Liege. In the interim, preparations were made to attack the two forts which commanded the town. Three days together we battered the citadel, and the breach being thought sufficient, we assaulted it the 23rd in the afternoon. We soon carried the half-moon, and finding less resistance than we expected, we cleared the palisades, mounted the breach sword in hand, and made a cruel slaughter. The English, in particular, distinguished themselves in this assault; for they mounted at a place called the Six-cent-pas, the six hundred steps, for so many there are, and steeper than any pair of stairs I ever saw in my life.

We found in the place above thirty pieces of cannon, and beside twenty thousand florins in silver, a very considerable booty; for the citizens had carried thither their most valuable effects for security. I got but little of the plunder; for the grenadiers, who were in the place, before our dragoons had dismounted and left their horses to the care of every tenth man, which we do when we fight on foot, were very industrious in their search. I got, however, a large silver chalice, and some other pieces of plate, which I afterwards sold to a Dutch jew for a third part of their value.

As the citadel was taken by assault, few of the garrison escaped with life, and not one of those who did carried off with them rags enough for a cut finger.

We, after this, attacked the fort of the Carthusians on the other side the Maes. Our batteries began to play the 29th, with great fury; the garrison, terrified by the example made of that citadel, and fearing an assault, in less than three hours asked to capitulate. Articles were that day agreed upon, and the French marched out the next.

The taking of these places proved a great refreshment to the army, for we found a great quantity of good wine, and excellent bread.

Thus ended our first campaign in Flanders; the success of which did not a little raise the hopes of the allies.

I forgot to take notice of the declaration of war; for though hostilities were begun before any was made, yet they were carried on but a little while; for the emperor declared war the 15th of May, 1702, N. S., as did the English queen and the Dutch on the same day.

In Italy, Prince Eugene, in October this year, surprised Cremona, got into the town through an aqueduct, and had kept possession had not the courage of my countrymen, so much despised in England, driven out the Germans; who, however, carried off prisoners Marshal Villeroy, Monsieurs de Mongon, d'Egrigny, and some other persons of distinction. The honour of taking the marshal fell also to an Irishman, captain of horse in the imperial service.

I was ordered into quarters at Venlo, and a night or two afterwards, was one of those commanded by the governor to escort the Earl of Marlborough along the banks of the Maes, the troops which brought him from Ruremond having been dismissed. During our march, by the darkness of the night, we mistook, and going up the country, fell in with a hogsty, where was a sow with five pigs, one of which I made bold with. I was possessed of it some time, when one Taylor, a corporal, belonging to Brigadier Panton's regiment of horse, attempted to spoil me of my booty; on which some words arising, he drew, and made a stroke at my head, which I warding with my hand, had the sinew of my little finger cut in two; at the same time, with the butt end of my pistol, I struck out one of his eyes. When we returned to our quarters, I got the sinew sewed up. In the interim, our general was taken prisoner by a party of thirty-five soldiers; but got off by means of a sham pass. The next day we heard of this accident, but not of his having escaped. The garrison, as the earl was entirely beloved by all the forces, was greatly alarmed, and the governor of Venlo, placing himself at our head, marched straight to Guelders, to which place he imagined the earl had been conducted, threatening to come to the utmost extremities if he was not delivered up. In the mean while, he received certain advice of our general being in safety; on which we marched back to our quarters, without attempting any action, and soon after had the joyful news of the queen having rewarded his virtues with the titles of Marquis of Blandford and Duke of Marlborough; on which the rejoicings customary were made, and we were regaled at our bonfires with good liquor.

As we lay quiet all the winter, my husband, whom the hurry of the war had in a manner banished, occurred to my memory, and I made what inquiry I could after him, but in vain; wherefore, I endeavoured, as I concluded him for ever lost, to forget him, as the melancholy the remembrance of him brought upon me, profited him nothing, while it consumed me. To do this, I had recourse to wine and company, which had the effect I wished, and I spent the season pretty cheerfully.

The Duke of Marlborough parted from London in March, 1703, N. S., to put himself at the head of the army, and open the campaign. He stayed some little time at the Hague, to be present at, and give his advice in the conferences then held; after which he took upon him the command, and invested Bonn on the 24th of April. This town was the residence of the elector of Cologne, who had received into it a French garrison, for which reason we ravaged the countries of Berg, Cologne, and Cleves, and wasted them with pillaging and contribution.

We opened the trenches before Bonn, and the fort on the other side of the Rhine, the 3rd of May, in the night. Our fire was so brisk, and we pushed on our attacks with so much fury, that the garrison in the fort set fire to their barracks, blew up their magazines, and got into the town sheltered by the smoke. On the 12th, the breach was large enough for a regiment to mount at a time: we carried the covered way, made a lodgment on the palisades, and everything was ready for a general assault, when Monsieur d'Alegre hung out a white ensign. The capitulation was signed that night, and four days after the garrison marched out through the breach, with only six pieces of cannon, and were conducted the shortest way to Luxemburg.

The duke having provided for the security of this place, the greatest part of the troops employed against it marched towards Brabant to join the grand army, which field-marshal Auverquerque had drawn together at Maestricht, and which observed the motions of marshal Boufflers and Villeroy. After this junction, the allies marched towards the lines the French had thrown up from the Scheld to the Maes, near Namur, to cover Brabant.

On the other hand, Baron Spar and Monsieur Coehorn, with a part of the army, put great part of Flanders under contribution. The grand army was designed to attack the French lines in Brabant, and in case of succeeding, to, afterwards, besiege Antwerp; and to this end, Baron Obdam had taken post at Ekeren, pretty near that city, with thirteen battalions and twenty-six squadrons. The grand army was marched to encamp before the lines, between Courselle and Beringhen.

The distance between the two armies, and the feebleness of that commanded by the baron, made Boufflers resolve on surrounding him; and accordingly, having placed troops in all the passes through which the Dutch must necessarily retreat, with fifty-three battalions, seventy companies of grenadiers, and fifty-two squadrons drawn out of the neighbouring garrisons, on the 29th of June, in the night, he began his march, which was so secret and expeditious, that the baron, though he had information of the enemy being in motion, had not time to send off his heavy baggage to Bergopsoom ; and when he thought of retreating, he found himself enveloped by the enemy, who attacked him so briskly, that his men were driven from the posts they had taken. The baron, being gone some distance from the gross of his troops, to give orders, had the misfortune to have his return cut off, and was obliged to fly to Breda. The fight, which began at three in the afternoon, grew hotter and hotter ; the Dutch taking courage from their despair, being entirely surrounded, and the French being irritated at so obstinate a resistance, when, on account of their great superiority, they flattered themselves with an easy victory. The battle lasted till night, when the Dutch foot beginning to want powder and ball, with their bayonets fixed, attacked and carried the village of Otteren ; took one piece of cannon, two kettle-drums, seven colours, with two standards, and passing the night in this village, they retreated in good order to Lillo.

The battle of Ekeren was very bloody ; but the Dutch troops gained more honour in it than their general, who if he did not want courage, could lay no claim to conduct.

It was now resolved, in a grand council of war, since we could not bring the enemy to a battle, which had been often, in vain, offered them, to draw together all the troops dispersed in different posts, and besiege Huy ; it being thought too hazardous to attack them in their lines, where they had sheltered themselves.

When our army drew near to Huy, the garrison withdrew into the castle, and we took possession of the town. Before I proceed, I must take notice of one action, which had liked to have slipped my memory. Monsieur de Villeroy, some little time before we opened the trenches before the town, spread it abroad that he would give us battle ; upon which our army drew up, but he not liking our countenances, altered his mind, if before he was in earnest, and retired into his lines. Our lieutenant, with thirty of our dragoons, fell in with a party of forty horse of the enemy, but they took to flight at the first fire, and we pursued them to the barriers of their intrenchments ; and being there ordered to stand our ground, we maintained it, in the midst of many smart fires, till we had taken a view of the enemy's situation, which was the errand our regiment and some others were sent upon.

The Baron de Trogné opened the trenches before Fort St.

Joseph on the 17th of August, N. S., and, the next day ground was broke before Fort Picard. They surrendered on the 27th, and Count Sinzendorf taking possession of the place for the emperor, we prepared for another siege. Monsieur de Bulau, lieutenant-general of the Hanoverian troops, was, on the 8th of September, detached with twenty-four squadrons to invest Limbourg, and the rest of the troops designed for this siege having joined him, they immediately carried part of the suburbs, and on the 21st took the lower town. As the garrison was pretty much straitened in what was still in their possession, five battalions were left to blockade and starve them to a surrender; but, tired with this tedious method, on the 26th the besiegers began to batter the place with forty-two pieces of cannon from four batteries, and with twenty mortars. The fire continued very vigorous till about the next day at noon, when the governor seeing great part of the rampart demolished, beat the chamade, and surrendered prisoners of war. However, all the officers were handsomely treated, and nothing taken from them, or even their soldiers, arms excepted.

The grand army did nothing more this campaign, than observe the enemy, to favour the Brandenburgers, who were sate down before Gueldre, which they took, after an obstinate defence, having been battered, after a blockade of the whole summer, with fifty-one pieces of cannon, twenty culverins, and twenty mortars, which reduced the town to a heap of rubbish, from the 7th of October to the 17th of December.

The emperor having made cession of his right to the Spanish monarchy, to his elder son the King of the Romans, and he again to the archduke his brother, who was set out to take possession of Spain, the Duke of Marlborough left the army, and set out for the elector Palatine's court, to meet and compliment the new king, Charles III., in the name of our queen.

The success attending the arms of the French and the Elector of Bavaria in Germany, alarming England and Holland, they resolved to seek them, even in the heart of Germany. To this end, their forces, about the end of April, 1704, were assembled upon the Maes, between Venlo and Maestricht, where we were joined, in the beginning of May, by the Duke of Marlborough and field-marshal Auverquerque. After a council of war had been held, the army was divided into two corps, one of which, strong enough to make head against the French in the Low Countries, was left under the command of Monsieur Auverquerque, and the other, commanded by the Duke of Marlborough, passing the Rhine, the Main, and the Nekre, by long and tiresome marches, which greatly harassed our foot, made for the Danube. I cannot help taking notice in this place, though it breaks in upon my narrative, of the Duke of Marlborough's great humanity, who seeing some of our foot drop, through the fatigue of the march, took them into his own coach.

The French, following the example of the allies, drew twenty thousand men out of the Low Countries, who began their march the 18th of May, and passed by Luxemburg to re-enforce the Elector of Bavaria in Germany, under the command of Villeroy. But, before he came to the end of his march, the Duke of Marlborough had joined the Prince of Baden at Lutshausen, which obliged the elector to withdraw to Dilling, a very advantageous post, and strongly fortified, leaving eighteen of his regiments, and eight squadrons, with the Count of Arco, who posted himself on the hill of Schellenberg by Donawert, in intrenchments in a manner inaccessible, that he might cover Bavaria. The resolution was, notwithstanding, taken to attack him, and to open a passage, by forcing his post, to the very heart of the electorate.

We decamped the 2nd of July from Onderingen, and advanced to Ubermargen, within a league of Donawert; but our vanguard did not come in sight of the enemy's intrenchments till the afternoon: however, not to give the Bavarians time to make themselves yet stronger, the duke ordered the Dutch General Goor, who commanded the right wing, composed of English and Dutch, with some auxiliary troops, to attack, as soon as possible: thus we did not stay for the coming up of the imperialists. We began about six o'clock, and were twice repulsed, with very great loss; but this did not abate anything of our courage; our men, rather animated by this resistance, gave a third assault, at the time the Prince of Baden arrived with the German troops of the right wing, who attacked on his side. The slaughter, which was very great, had lasted above an hour, when the Duke of Wirtemberg had the good fortune, with seven squadrons, to empty the enemy's trenches, by the covered way of Donawert, and fell upon their rear. The Bavarians were now soon routed, and a cruel slaughter made of them, and the bridge over the Danube breaking down, a great number were drowned, or taken prisoners. In the second attack, I received a ball in my hip, which is so lodged between the bones that it can never be extracted; to this day the wound is open, and has almost deprived me of the use of my leg and thigh. Captain Young, who, poor gentleman, was soon after killed, desired me to get off; but, upon my refusal, he ordered two of my comrades to take me up, and they set me at the foot of a tree, where I endeavoured to animate my brother soldiers, till I had the pleasure of seeing them get into the trenches and beat down their enemies; though it was a dear-bought victory, as they disputed every inch of ground, and showed an uncommon bravery. We lost, of my acquaintance, Captain Young, Captain Douglass, and Lieutenant Maltary, besides a number of private men.

I was carried to the hospital near Schellenberg, and put under the care of three surgeons, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Laurence, and Mr. Sea, and narrowly escaped being discovered. Here, while I was under cure, I received my share of what plunder was made, which the duke's justice ordered to be impartially distributed among his brave fellow-soldiers. Beside the arms the fugitives threw away, the allies took sixteen pieces of cannon, thirteen standards and colours, all the tents, the baggage and plate of the Count of Arco. This general, when he found his intrenchments entered by the allies, withdrew to Donawert; but the inhabitants not opening the gates soon enough, he was forced to throw himself into the Danube, and had the good fortune to get safe to Augsburg. When the gates of Donawert were set open, those who kept the intrenchments on the side of the town, crowded into it, and at first made a show of defending it; but that evening, having received orders from the elector to burn the town and provisions, to blow up the ammunition, break down the bridges, and retreat to Augsburg, they clapped straw into the houses, to which they began to set fire; but had not time to perfect their design, for fear of their retreat being cut off, the allies being got into the suburbs, and laying bridges over the river, which compelled them to withdraw at four o'clock in the morning, and gave the burghers an opportunity to save the town. The allies entered it, and therein found three pieces of cannon, twelve pontons of copper, twenty thousand weight of powder, three thousand sacks of flour, quantities of oats, and other provisions. These were the fruits of our victory, which, however, we purchased by the loss of three thousand brave fellows killed and wounded, and, among several other general officers of distinction, General Goor received a musket-ball in his eye, and instantly expired in the arms of Monsieur Mortaigne, who ran to his assistance. The Duke of Luneburg Bevern was mortally wounded, and died before the fight was over.

The allies having garrisoned Donawert, made themselves masters of Rain, by composition, and carried the little town of Aicha sword in hand, where they put five hundred of the garrison to death, and took the rest prisoners. They had now nothing to prevent their piercing to the centre of Bavaria, where they were so greatly alarmed, that the inhabitants of Lechhausen, Strottingen, and Friedbergen, hearing of the defeat at Schellenberg, quitted their houses, and even the Electress of Bavaria did not think herself in safety at Munich, though she had eight thousand men of regular troops; but desired the Archbishop of Saltzburg to give her shelter. Her fear was not groundless; for, after the taking Rain and Aicha, the allies sent parties on every hand to ravage the country, who pillaged above fifty villages, burnt the houses of peasants and gentlemen, and forced the inhabitants, with what few cattle had escaped the insatiable enemy, to seek refuge in the woods.

The elector, who, after the defeat of his troops near Donawert, expected to see his country laid waste, held a council of war in the open field, composed of his generals and most experienced officers; wherein it was resolved immediately to abandon the camp of Lauingen, though very advantageous, and extremely well fortified, and to reinforce the army as much as possible.

In consequence of this resolution, they drew out the Bavarian garrisons of Hochstat, Dillingen, Lauingen, Neuburg, and of several little towns; after which, their army encamped under the walls of Augsburg, whither they had before sent immense sums under a strong escort, raised by the plunder and contributions of the preceding year. The elector lodged in the convent of St. Uliu, and compelling the burghers to work day and night on the intrenchments of his camp, he surrounded it with a ditch fifty feet wide, and proportionably deep, that he might, in greater security, wait the succours Marshal Tallard was leading to him.

The event proved, that the elector was in the right to depend on succour from France ; for the two marshals, Villeroy and Tallard, ordered their march so as to arrive at Augsburg in the beginning of August. The Prince Eugene, of Savoy, who had hitherto watched them, now joined the grand army, part of which formed the siege of Ingolstadt, under the command of the Prince of Baden. The enemy were, by this siege, drawn out of their intrenchments, and having posted themselves at Hochstat, the allies resolved to decamp from Erlinkhoven, and go thither to attack them, though their right was protected by the Danube, and their left by the wood of Lutzingen, and their fronts by two rivulets and a morass, which entirely sheltered them.

At six o'clock in the morning, on the 13th of August, 1704, we came in sight of the enemy, and, about eleven, were drawn up in order of battle ; we then threw five bridges, made of fascines and tin pontoons, over the rivulet before the faces of the enemy, posted behind it, and at two, the signal was given to attack.

Every one has read an account of this battle, which was as memorable as that of Crecy, or Agencourt ; wherefore it is needless for me to trouble my readers with a detail of it. I shall only take notice of one thing, in honour to that great and glorious English captain, the Duke of Marlborough, which is, that after part of the horse of the left wing of our army had passed with a good deal of difficulty, the rivulet, the rest endeavouring also to pass it, were twice repulsed, which the duke seeing, led them on himself for the third time, and making the enemy give ground, their main battle was defeated, and their right, which opposed the duke, and was of French troops, was driven to the banks of the Danube, and separated from the rest of the army ; while the Bavarians twice repulsed our right wing, where Prince Eugene commanded, and had driven him a hundred and fifty feet beyond his first post, which made the duke, who had now his hands at liberty, send a detachment to attack the enemy in the rear, and assist the prince ; but before these orders could be put in execution, he had made a fourth attack upon, and put to flight, the Bavarians in the right wing.

After the loss of this battle, the Elector of Bavaria drew his garrison out of Augsburg, and the magistrates immediately sent advice of it to the prince and duke, requiring their protection, which was readily granted.

After the victory of Hochstat, the allies did not think proper to push on the siege of Ingolstadt; wherefore, leaving some forces to keep it invested, the rest marched to reinforce the grand army, commanded by Prince Eugene. The English and Dutch, under the command of the Duke of Marlborough, on the 22nd of August, N. S., appeared before Ulm, where the enemies, in their flight, had left a strong garrison under the command of General Bettendorf, both to favour their retreat, and to cut out some work for the allies in those parts. The day of our arrival before this town, the duke ordered the governor to be summoned; who answering, that he would defend the town to the last extremity, a council of war was held, and, according to the resolutions therein taken, the army divided; Prince Eugene and the duke marched with the major part, by different routes, towards the Rhine, and the rest, which were imperial troops, continued in Suabia, under the command of General Thungen, to take in Ulm, and other towns in the possession of the enemy, and to entirely subdue the whole country; which he did.

After the reduction of Ulm, which capitulated as soon as the batteries of the besieged were ready, notwithstanding the resolute answer sent to the duke's summons, the Baron de Thungen joined the grand army, under the Duke of Marlborough, which covered the siege of Landau, invested the 13th of September. The King of the Romans, desirous to be at the siege, set out eleven days before from Vienna, of which, advice being come, Prince Eugene and the Duke set out to receive him between Philipsburg and Landau, and conducted him through the army, under arms, to his quarters at Ilbesheim.

This town, and all others in which the elector had garrisons, were evacuated by treaty; he himself entirely stripped of his country; his electress and children made prisoners; his subjects disarmed, and obliged to take an oath of allegiance to the emperor; five thousand men garrisoned in his metropolis, and the estates of such of his subjects as had followed his fortunes, were confiscated. In a word, Bavaria was treated as a conquered country, and the Count Leuvenstein-Worthem was made governor of it.

I have already said, we miserably plundered the poor inhabitants of this electorate; I had left the hospital time enough to contribute to their misery, and to have a share in the plunder. We spared nothing, killing, burning, or otherwise destroying whatever we could carry off. The bells of the churches we broke to pieces, that we might bring them away with us. I filled two bed-ticks, after having thrown out the feathers, with bell-metal, mens' and womens' clothes, some velvets, and about a hundred Dutch caps, which I had plundered from a shop; all which I sold by the lump to a Jew, who followed the army to purchase our pillage, for four pistoles; beside the above things, as I was not idle, I got several pieces of plate, as spoons, mugs, cups, &c., all which the same conscionable merchant had at his own price.

I might have mentioned this more properly before, but I did not think what regarded me in particular, of consequence enough to break the thread of my narration; and the same reason prevails on me to go back to the siege of Landau, under the command of the King of the Romans, which, after a vigorous defence, surrendered on the 22nd of November. It was invested, as I have already said, the 13th of September.

I now come to my own history. After the battle of Hochstat, in which I received no hurt, though often in the hottest of the fire, I was one of those detached to guard the prisoners; and surely, of all I ever saw, none were more miserable; some having no shirts, some without shoes or stockings, and others naked as from the womb. In this wretched condition we marched them to the plain of Breda, where we halted to refresh; each man, prisoners and all, being allowed a pint of beer and a pennyworth of bread and cheese. During our halt here, I was amused with two very different scenes by the women, some of which bewailed the loss of their husbands, or lovers, who fell in the two memorable battles of Schellenberg and Hochstat; and others congratulating and caressing their spouses and sweethearts who had escaped the danger. Among the latter, I observed a woman, with a visible joy in her face, make up to a man, whom, by his side face, I fancied I had known; I drew near to the palisades where my horse was tied, and looking through at the instant he turned to embrace her, had a full view of, and perfectly knew him, to my unspeakable grief, to be my perfidious husband, on whose account I had experienced so much fatigue, such misery, and had so often hazarded my life. The seeing him caress the Dutch woman, for such she appeared to be, and really was, raised in me so great an indignation, that I was resolved to banish every tender thought which might plead in his favour, and wipe the idea of him out of my memory. Thus resolved, I turned my back upon them, and had no sooner done it, but I began to think his infidelity rather a misfortune to me than a fault in him, as he had never received any news, or answer to his letters, of which he mentioned twelve in the only one I received. I was so divided between rage and love, resentment and compassion, that the agitation of my mind had such a visible effect on my body, and was so plainly discernible in my countenance, that my comrade asked me what it was that troubled me, that I changed colour, and trembled as I did, all over me. I had a pot of beer in my hand, and had not power to utter more than, Take the beer, I can hold it no longer. After some little time, I recovered my spirits, and answered, that I saw my brother, Richard Welsh (I had often declared I had such a brother in the army, of whom I could hear no news) standing in the foremost rank of Lord Orkney's regiment of foot, and that I had not seen him of twelve years before; this sudden and unexpected sight of a lost brother, occasioned the disorder in me he had remarked. I then pointed him out, and begged my comrade to step and ask him if his name was not Richard Welsh, and when he had heard from his wife and children. He readily complied with my request, and, as I could not take my eye off him, I saw my comrade accost him, and immediately return with this answer, that as he was the first man upon command, I might speak to him at the main guard: hardly had he delivered these few words, when the drums and trumpets gave us notice to march for Breda, from whence we were distant about a league, though it appeared to me ten times as long, so uneasy was I, and anxious to speak to him, and hear what he could say in his vindication.

On our arrival at Breda, we were obliged to house our prisoners, whose number was so great, that it compelled us to the making prisons of workhouses, and even of those of private people. After my duty was performed, I went in search of my husband to the main guard, where I learned that he was at a public house behind it. I immediately followed him thither, and passing through the outward room to the kitchen, saw him there, drinking with the Dutch woman. I took no notice of him, but going up to the landlady, desired to be shown a private room; she accordingly went before me into one backwards, and bringing me a pint of beer which I called for, left me to my own melancholy thoughts. I sat me down, laid my elbow on the table, and leaning my head on my hand, I began to reflect on my former happy situation after the death of my aunt, and of the misfortunes which had attended my love for a man who no longer thought of me, though obliged by the strongest ties of gratitude. But, said I, Have I done more than my duty? Is he not my husband? Nay, did he not, till an unforeseen misfortune tore him from me, treat me with the greatest tenderness? Had I once reason to complain of his want of love or gratitude? But why is he thus changed? Here his fondness which I had observed for the Dutch woman, gave vent to my tears, which flowing in abundance, was some relief to me. I could not stop this flood; it continued a good quarter of an hour; at length it ceased, and, drinking a little of the hougarde, which is a white beer, in colour like whey, I washed my eyes and face with the rest, to conceal my having wept. I did all I could to compose myself, and, calling my landlady, I desired she would bring another pint, and acquaint the young man of Orkney's regiment, drinking in her kitchen, that I desired to speak to him. She delivered my message, and he came in with her. I sat with my back to the light, that he might not see my face plain enough to discover me before I had sounded what interest I retained in his heart. I saluted him by his name, which he civilly returned, and added, that I had the advantage, for he found I knew him, though I appeared a stranger. Yes, sir, replied I, you are not unknown to me. Pray when did you hear from your wife and children? Sir, said he, I have heard no news of them these twelve years, though I have written no less than a dozen letters to her, which I am apt to believe have miscarried. I answered, that I believe he did not think that a misfortune to lay to heart, since a number of pretty girls here, who were all tender-hearted to the gentlemen of the sword, would easily compensate the absence of, and prevent any concern for a wife; you, doubtless, find it so. Sir, replied he, you take me for a villain, and you lie; I do not find it so. Not a man in the army would have given me the lie with impunity; but I must own, receiving it from him on such an account, was a greater pleasure to me than if I had been complimented at the head of all our troops by the Duke of Marlborough. A sudden tremor seized me, which he, who had his hand on his sword, taking notice of, and viewing me more intently, discovered that I was his wife. Oh heavens! cried he, is this possible? Is it not delusion? Do I really see my dear Christian? May I believe my eyes? He ran to me, clasped me in his arms, kissed me in raptures, and bedewed my cheeks with tears of joy. As soon as I could disengage myself, I replied, Yes, Richard, 'tis I, who have been so many years in search of an ungrateful, perjured husband; for, whatever your sex may think of a marriage vow, or properly, though you never think of it at all, the breach of it leaves the foul stain of perjury. What a comfortable reward have I met with for abandoning peace and plenty, could I have known peace without you! for leaving my poor babes, my aged mother, my friends, my relations, and country, to expose myself to the hardships, fatigues, and dangers of a soldier's life, in search of a husband whom I have, at length, found in the arms of another woman! How have I deserved this treatment? What fault of mine, if not my over fondness, could make you cruelly desert me and your children, and rather desperately take up with a life of incessant toil and penury, than continue longer with a wife whom you drove to the utmost despair, by the reasonable belief of your being murdered? as it was impossible for me to think you could make me so barbarous and ungrateful a return for my tenderness. My dear Christian, said he, Do not imbitter the joy I feel in thus meeting with you, by such cruel and undeserved reproaches. Had you received any of my letters, you must have learned my misfortune, not my fault, caused our unhappy separation; for, in every one of them, I gave you a true account. I wish, said I, interrupting him, I had not received that which you said was your twelfth; for my tenderness would not let me believe you capable of a falsity, as I now am convinced you are; it was the fatal receipt of that letter which ruined my peace, by going in search of it. Yes, that letter made me resolve to undergo all dangers, rather than not find you out; had it not come to hand, I might have been still undeceived in the belief of your death; time would have mitigated my grief, and forgetting you, as I am a witness you did me, I might have continued at this time in easy and happy circumstances, have enjoyed the comfort of my friends and relations, and have done my duty to my children, in taking care of their education and settlement, instead of being harassed with fatigues of war, and my poor infants exposed to the hazard of being brought up vagabonds. I have at length found you, but so altered from the just and endearing husband you once were, that I had rather have had assurance of your death, than see you thus survive your affections, which I once was fool enough to believe nothing could take from me.

Believe me, said he, my dear Christian, they are still as warm towards you as ever; pardon my faults, which I acknowledge, and make a just distinction between the tender, friendly love for a wife, and the slight, trifling complaisance for such creatures, as may prove our amusement, but can never gain our esteem; and where that is wanting, you are satisfied, however it may be counterfeited, there can be no warm affection.

How know I that woman is not your wife? He answered, No; I own I have my follies, but that does not make me unjust. Here the woman, surprised at his stay, came to the door, and at my bidding, came in, and said, My dear, why do you leave me thus alone? This expression of her fondness threw him into a passion, and he swore that if ever she again used that expression, or followed him more, he would be her death. Passion, said I, proceeds very often from, and is a proof of guilt. It is not manly to treat a woman ill, especially if you have, as much I fear, seduced her with a promise of marriage, a practice too customary with our cloth: in such case I shall hold her innocent, if, when she knows you have a wife and children, she breaks off a conversation which will be then criminal in her to continue. Young woman, said I, turning to her, Is this man your husband? She answered in the affirmative, which again put him into a passion, and he denied his ever being married to her, with bitter imprecations. I repeated my question to the woman, who said, indeed the ceremony had not been performed, but that they had been contracted several months, and cohabited, when he was not in the field, as man and wife. I am sorry for your misfortune; for this man is married, and has been so many years, to my sister, by whom he has had three children; so that you can have nothing to expect from him but scandal. If you value your reputation or safety, or have any regard for him, avoid him for the future; for I have so great a love for my sister, that if he continued to injure her, I would revenge it as an insult on myself, and expose my life rather than suffer her to be wronged with impunity. What is passed can no otherwise be redressed than by your being no more guilty; on that condition I forgive you, and will endeavour to forget it. The poor woman burst into a flood of tears, and said, no man should have robbed her of her innocence; but she was betrayed by his reiterated promises, backed with solemn oaths, to make her his lawful wife. This he denied as passionately, which made the woman fly into such a rage, and vilify him in such opprobrious terms, that I feared he would do her a mischief, and gave me trouble enough to appease both parties. At length, my temper and reasons brought them to a calm, but it did not stop the woman's tears, who left us weeping, and with a resolution, at least a seeming one, never to come near him more. When she was gone, I represented to him, in the blackest colours, the villany of seducing young women by promises of marriage; and told him, that he must account for the breach of such oaths in another life, if he escaped unpunished in this. I told him after this, that notwithstanding the hardships I had gone through, and the wounds I had received, I had such a liking to the service, that I was resolved to continue in it, and to that end, would pass as his brother, and furnish him with what shirts, or other necessaries, he wanted, while he concealed my sex; but, if ever he discovered me, I would forget he was my husband, and he should find me a dangerous enemy.

What, then, said he, will you be cruel enough to rob me of my wife? Will you not give me the satisfaction of letting the world know how much you deserve, and how gratefully I can acknowledge the obligation your uncommon love has lain me under? For Heaven's sake reverse so intolerable a sentence! What! have you run so many hazards, borne the fatigue of so many years, only to have the satisfaction of tormenting me? Do you call this love? Banish me your bed——. I interrupted him with saying, he had forfeited his right to it, by having taken another to his; that my resolution was fixed, and all he could urge would not shake it; therefore desired he would put an end to a vain solicitation, which, if he continued, or ever once renewed, till accident, or peace, discovered me to be a woman, I would never more see him, or be any way assistant to him. Well, said he, I hope time will mollify you; I must obey. We sat together some little time after this; then I paid the reckoning, and gave my husband a piece of gold, telling him, he would find me a kind and generous brother, but that he must not think of enjoying his wife, while I could remain concealed, and the war lasted. He embraced me passionately, and telling me he did not think my heart as hard as he found it, we withdrew to our respective posts. We saw and conversed with each other every day, and he would often begin his solicitations, but I immediately put a stop to them. He kept my secret, and, had I not been discovered by an accident, which I shall take notice of in its proper place, I should have continued a dragoon to the end of the war, when I intended, if God spared my life so long, to lay aside my disguise, return to Dublin, and resume my former business.

Having secured our prisoners, we returned to the army, which, under the command of his Grace the Duke of Marlborough, covered the siege of Landau before mentioned. After the surrender of this town to the King of the Romans, we were ordered to winter-quarters in Holland, leaving the foot, among which was my husband, behind us. His grace having made a tour into Germany, returned to England with his share of the prisoners, standards, and colours, taken at Hochstat.

I obtained leave to visit the Hague, certainly the most beautiful village in the whole world: from thence I made a tour to Rotterdam, and, in the dragschoot, happening to sit by a pretty Dutch girl, I told her she was very handsome. She returned, that I was very complaisant, but she did not know any one to whom she would more willingly appear agreeable; for I was a pretty young fellow. I find, said I, your banter will soon silence me; I said that you were handsome, because you are really so, and you are turning me into ridicule for speaking my sentiments; indeed, what I said was needless, because you cannot but be conscious of your own perfections; but out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaks. The very reason, replied she, that, before I was aware, I spoke my thoughts, which are altogether as sincere as your compliment.—Were they so, I should be the happiest man in the whole army of the allies. And, could I make you that happy man, it would, perhaps, make me the most miserable woman.—Then you are of opinion that a soldier cannot make a good husband.—That is not my reason; it is, I should be in continual apprehension for your life, and never know a minute's peace in your absence.—Such a confession might make any man vain, though from a person of much less merit; but I have too great an opinion of your good sense to flatter myself that your heart corresponds with your tongue: no, you thought my declaration impertinent, and you have a mind to revenge yourself, by first raising my vanity, and then laughing at my credulity.—The schoot was, by this time, arrived at Delft; we all went across that town, which is the worst paved in Holland, to take another schoot at Amsterdam. I gallanted my pretty frow through the street, said all the fine things to her I could think of, and was so importunate to know her place of abode, and to have leave to wait on her, that she let me, at length, know it was without the gate, near the Scotch dike; and added, that if I was sincere, and my intentions honourable, she would give me leave to see her home, when we should come to Rotterdam, and should not be displeas'd with my future visits. In a word, at our arrival, she gave me her hand to help her out of the schoot, and conducted me to her lodgings, where she called for a bottle of wine to refresh me. I drank a glass or two before any but a servant appeared; but, not long after, a sister came in, who embraced her, and asked who I was. She told her that I was a gentleman belonging to the English forces (for I had told her, in our passage; she could not otherwise have known, as I was dressed genteelly in a plain suit), and that she was indebted to me for many civilities. The sister made me a compliment, and said her mother would thank me, were she not indisposed. On this, my fair one begged me to excuse her waiting on her mother, and with a surprise, said, The maid told me she was well. I told her I would take a more convenient time to pay her my respects; and, withdrawing, went into the town and got a lodging on the Scotch dike, in a house where a Scotch serjeant, of my acquaintance, going to Scotland to recruit, then lodged. His name was John Beggs; and, since that, he himself kept the same house, and had got money enough, if his good nature, and the credit he gave to any of the three nations, especially if they played at backgammon, had not kept him under to the day of his death. We were glad to see each other, supped together, and, over a bottle, I told honest John what a fortunate adventure I had met with in my passage. I assure you, said he, you have reason to call it fortunate, for they are mighty virtuous young ladies: there are three sisters and the mother, who live together, and are noted for their extensive charity. I have the honour to be well with, and visit the family: if you consent to it, we will wait on them tomorrow. I was glad to hear this character of the family, as I thought I might pass the few days I intended to stay at Rotterdam, in an agreeable, amusing way.

The next morning honest John showed me the town; we saw the town-house and anatomy chamber, the shambles, and the statue of Erasmus, with the house where that great man was born, and then, being tired of rambling, went to our quarters to dinner; after which, we set out to visit my new female acquaintance. We were carried into the same parlour I had been in the evening before. John bid the maid bring a bottle of wine, and tell the lady of the house he was there. I reprimanded him for his freedom, and told him I thought he took as much liberty as if he was in a public house. Oh, said he, they allow me to take what liberty I please: they are the best-natured family in Holland. At that instant my fellow-traveller came in, whom my friend John taking hold of, pulled upon his knee, and she suffered him to take such liberties as convinced me that there was not a family of more extensive charity; for they made no distinctions of rank, nation, or religion. She asked John if I was his acquaintance. He told her I was; Then, said she, as the gentleman made me a great many fine speeches in the schoot, and I really like him, do you take my sister, and oblige your friend and me, by my convincing him that I thought him a pretty fellow, as well as said so. I was greatly shocked at my disappointment, and had much ado to prevent my treating her in a very rough manner, when she threw her arms round my neck and would have kissed me. I pushed her rudely off, saying, I had mistaken a fiend for an angel. I would have gone directly out of the house, but she clapped herself before the door, and told me, I must first pay the bottle of wine I had the evening before. Upon being told it was a guder, I threw down the money, and flew out of the house in a rage; my friend paid the other bottle, and followed me, laughing as if he would never have given over. When he could get the better of his fit, he asked me if I did not think myself fortunate in so virtuous an acquaintance.

Having visited Amsterdam, I returned to my quarters, where I stayed till the opening of the campaign of 1705. We marched out of our winter-quarters, and encamped between Maestricht and Liege. The Duke of Marlborough arrived at the Hague on the 14th of April, where he stayed but a few days before he set out to place himself at the head of the army. The foregoing campaign it was agreed to provide good magazines in Germany, which his grace relying upon, took the better part of the army, after he had reviewed us, and directed his march towards the Moselle, to join the Germans betimes, not at all doubting but the French would draw off from the Low Countries a considerable number of their forces, and send them the same way to oppose the allies: but they were too well informed of the neglect of what had been agreed upon; were satisfied the duke would lose a great deal of time in waiting for the Germans, and were therefore determined to take advantage of their delay, and undertake some important expedition on the Maes. The Dutch army, not being strong enough to keep the field, was intrenched under the cannon of Maestricht. The French, quitting their lines on the 27th of May, encamped at Vagnacourt, and at Val-Nôtre-Dame, and having sent a detachment over the Maes, they, the next day, invested Huy. The town, which was defenceless, immediately surrendered, upon condition that the burghers should keep their privileges, that the garrison should have liberty to retire into the castle, and that the French should not fire from the town on the castle, nor the others from the castle upon the town. On the 30th, at night, the trenches were opened before Fort Picard, which was carried on the third assault, with all its outworks. They, immediately after the reduction of this fort, with all possible expedition, raised new batteries against the others, and made such a terrible fire with thirty pieces of cannon and twenty mortars, that Cronstrom, who was governor, obliged to surrender prisoner of war on the 10th of June.

The French taking Huy, and laying siege to the citadel of Liege, together with the want of magazines on the Moselle (by which neglect the duke's army began to suffer), and the distance the Germans were off rendering it impossible to join him time enough to undertake anything considerable on that side, obliged the duke to quit the Moselle. His grace was no sooner arrived in the neighbourhood of Maestricht, but the French abandoned the city of Liege, raised the siege of the citadel, and withdrew, as usual, into their lines. The army being now united, took the field, and, in few days, retook Huy; and by the advice of his grace the Duke of Marlborough, resolved to attack the enemy's lines, by the shelter of which they had avoided a battle. To this end we decamped on the 17th of July, and marched straight to their lines, to attack them at one and the same time at Heilisheim, near the village and castle of Wang, and at the villages of Nederhespen and Oostmalen. The vanguard being, at break of day, arrived at the place of rendezvous, Count Noyelles immediately assaulted the castle of Wang, which, after a small defence, he carried, and entering the lines with the runaways, seized on the barriers, and drew up in order of battle.

Three battalions, with the like rapidity, possessed themselves of the village and bridge of Heilisheim, within a quarter of a league of Wang, and took post within the lines. Lieutenant-General Schultz, with as great facility, made himself master of the villages of Overhespen and Nederhespen; by which, our horse and dragoons having openings to enter the lines, his grace led us on, and formed us to make head against the enemy; their corps nearest to the places of attack were in motion at the first alarm, and about fifty squadrons and twenty battalions advanced to dispute the hollow way. Our horse, sustained by some of the foot, made our way; and the duke, at our head, charged the French horse so briskly, that he broke, entirely routed them, and made himself master of eight pieces of cannon. The rest of the French, who were advancing to support the foremost corps, seeing their horse take to flight, thought it no shame to follow their example. The glorious success of this attack of the French lines, the honour of which, as it was just, every one attributed to the Duke of Marlborough's advice, conduct, and intrepidity, was followed by the taking of Tirlemont, where a French battalion was made prisoners. The French army, which was obliged to retreat, some towards Namur, and others towards Louvain, found means to unite, and intrench themselves behind the Dyle. The duke would have attacked them here, but being opposed by the Dutch, we had a three days' march for nothing, which the duke resented so much, that the States, to give his grace satisfaction, removed General Schlangenburg, who made the opposition. After we had continued some time in view of the enemy, near the abbeys of Ulierbeek and Park, on the 29th of August the duke marched to Leuwe, which was invested the same day by fifteen battalions, and the same number of squadrons, notwithstanding its situation is in the middle of a morass. Lieutenant-General Dedem, who commanded this body of troops, having, on the 2nd of September, possessed himself of an advanced redoubt, which was raised on the avenue to the town, between nine and ten that night opened the trenches on the side of the gate of St. Tron, pushed on his works within two hundred yards of the covered way, and the batteries being soon ready to play, the Baron du Mont, who commanded in the place, offered to march out, if all military honours were allowed him. This being rejected, he and his garrison were compelled to yield themselves prisoners of war on the 5th of the same month.

Our army having levelled the French lines, broken the sluices, and demolished the outworks of Tirlemont, to prevent the enemy from keeping garrison in it in the winter, we marched to Herenthals, and his grace made a tour to the Hague. On his return to the army, we besieged Sanduliet. The trenches were opened on the 26th of October, and the garrison, in three days, forced to surrender prisoners of war. The taking of this town putting an end to the operations of this campaign, his grace the Duke of Marlborough went to Vienna, and was received with the highest marks of distinction. The emperor confirmed him prince of the empire, erected the district of Mildelheim into a principality for him, and gave advice of it to the diet of Ratisbon, enjoining them to receive a deputy of this principality, and to give him place in their sessions. The news of this being brought us, before we left Tirlemont, we were regaled with liquor, and made great rejoicings.

to me in particular this winter. Our recruits, and horses to remount those who had lost them, arrived in Holland the 3rd of April, 1706, and the Duke of Marlborough, with a number of volunteers, landed there on the 25th. The enemy in the interim, lost no time: they had wrought hard all the winter upon their intrenchments behind the Dyle and on the fortifying Louvain, where they had brought together such prodigious quantities of flour, hay, oats, and all sorts of ammunition, that the fifty colleges were quite filled, beside the shambles, convents, &c.

The Duke of Lorraine, fearing his country would be made the seat of war, from his grace's march in 1705 to the Moselle, when he drew near his frontiers, sent the Count Martigny to his grace, with a very complaisant letter; in which he entreated him to use that moderation towards a defenceless country, which had, on many other occasions, heightened his great character. He also acquired of, and obtained from, the King of the Romans, the emperor's protection; and, by a memorial, desired the States-general to observe the same neutrality with regard to him, who was no way interested in the Spanish succession. His envoy received the following answer to his memorial; That the States having been informed that the French had not only possessed themselves of very advantageous posts in Lorraine, but were actually at work to fortify Nancy, they could not look upon such a procedure as other than an infraction of the neutrality which they had desired the duke to observe, by compelling the French to evacuate those places which they had seized. France, however, was very far from such a disposition; for the king apprehending an invasion, by the way of Lorraine, in the very beginning of this year seized upon all the duke's states, placed garrisons in all his fortified towns, and obliged him to furnish three millions of livres yearly, towards the expense of the war.

I thought this little digression necessary, that my readers might be acquainted with the then situation of affairs.

Everything being ready on either side to open the campaign, the army of the allies, on the 22nd of May, encamped between Corris and Tourine, near the stone-mill of Kruisworm: the French also left their intrenchments on the Dyle, with design to surprise us while they were superior; for they had certain intelligence that the elector of Brandenburg, dissatisfied with the States on account of the inheritance of King William's estates, would not be over-hasty in sending his troops to the rendezvous; and that the Danes, who were at Nimeguen, had refused to march, by reason of the arrears due to them. Upon this advice, Marshal Villeroy wrote to the elector, to invite him to share the victory, which he flattered himself he was upon the point of gaining. The States getting intelligence of the contents of this letter, wrote to the Danes to join the army with all possible expedition, and they would give them immediate satisfaction. They readily obeyed, and their generals being advised of the design of the French, hastened the march of the Wirtemberg troops; and, after taking proper measures, it was resolved rather to attack than wait the enemy. The French, who were advanced as far as Ramillies, seeing us, contrary to their expectations, on our march, were terribly embarrassed, and imagined they had received false intelligence; however, there was no avoiding a battle. We began on the 23rd, about two in the afternoon. The left of our army, which attacked the right wing of the enemy, met with a stout resistance before they could break them; which, however, they at length did, and put them to flight, while we were not less successful in the right wing. In a word, the enemy was everywhere entirely routed, and never victory was more complete. The shattered remains of their army fled in the greatest confusion, some to Louvain, others to Waveren, and the rest to Judoigne. We took a great number of prisoners in the pursuit, many colours and standards; artillery and ammunition, tin pontons and baggage. I escaped unhurt, though in the hottest of the battle, till the French were entirely defeated; when an unlucky shell from a steeple, on which, before the battle, they had planted some mortars and cannon, which played all the time of the engagement, struck the back part of my head and fractured my skull. I was carried to Meldre, or Meldert, a small town in the quarter of Louvain, two leagues southeast from that university, and five leagues north-west from Ramillies, upon a small brook which washes Tirlemont. I was here trepanned, and great care taken of me, but I did not recover in less than ten weeks. Though I suffered great torture by this wound, yet the discovery it caused of my sex, in the fixing of my dressing, by which the surgeons saw my breasts, and, by the largeness of my nipples, concluded I had given suck, was a greater grief to me. No sooner had they made this discovery, but they acquainted Brigadier Preston, that his pretty dragoon (so I was always called) was, in fact, a woman. He was very loath to believe it, and did me the honour to say, he had always looked upon me as the prettiest fellow, and the best man he had. His incredulity made him send for my brother, whom he now imagined to be my husband; when he came, the brigadier said to him, Dick, I am surprised at a piece of news these gentlemen tell me; they say, your brother is, in reality, a woman. Sir, said he, since she is discovered, I cannot deny it; she is my wife, and I have had three children by her. The news of this discovery spread far and near, and reaching, among others, my Lord John Hay's ear, he came to see me, as did all my former comrades. My lord would neither ask me, nor suffer any one else, any questions; but called for my husband, though first for my comrade, who had been long my bedfellow, and examined him closely. The fellow protested, as it was truth, that he never knew I was a woman, or even suspected it; It is well known, continued he, that she had a child lain to her, and took care of it. My lord then calling in my husband, desired him to tell the meaning of my disguise. He gave him a full and satisfactory account of our first acquaintance, marriage, and situation, with the manner of his having entered into the service, and my resolution to go in search of him; adding the particulars of our meeting, and my obstinate refusal of bedding with him. My lord seemed very well entertained with my history, and ordered that I should want for nothing, and that my pay should be continued while under cure. When his lordship heard that I was well enough recovered to go abroad, he generously sent me a parcel of shirts and sheets to make me shifts. Brigadier Preston made me a present of a handsome silk gown; every one of our officers contributed to the furnishing me with what was requisite for the dress of my sex, and dismissed me the service with a handsome compliment. I being thus equipped, waited on my lord, the brigadier, and other my benefactors, to return them thanks for the obligations they had lain me under. My lord said, he hoped I would not continue my cruelty to my husband, now that I could no longer pass under a disguise. I answered, My lord, I must own, I have a strong inclination to the army, and I apprehended the consequence of conversing with my husband might be my dismissal ; for a great belly could not have been concealed. The discovery of my sex has now removed the cause, and I have no objection to living with my husband, as it is the duty of an honest wife. Well, said my lord, I am satisfied with your reason, and we will have a new marriage. Accordingly all our officers were invited, and we were, with great solemnity, wedded and bedded ; the sack-posset eaten, and the stocking thrown. After this ceremony, every one, at taking leave, would kiss the bride, and left me a piece of gold, some four or five, to put me in a way of life.

I conceived the first night, having never known man, except my husband, but the time I was surprised, as I have before related. An idle life was what I could never away with ; beside, I was under a necessity, having now no pay, to do something for a support ; wherefore I undertook to cook for our regiment, returning to my husband's quarters every night. I did not long carry on this business, as the close attendance it required prevented my marauding, which was vastly more beneficial. After I had given over my cooking, I turned sutler, and, by the indulgence of the officers, was permitted to pitch my tent in the front, while others were driven to the rear of the army.

The rapidity of the conquests which attended the victory of Ramillies, is so remarkable, that it would be unpardonable in me to pass it over in silence to continue my particular history.

Our victorious army having rested the night which followed the battle, briskly pursued the enemy the next morning, drew near to Judoigne, and crossed the Dyle on the 25th, near Louvain. This large city, being abandoned, submitted ; we took possession of all the great stores of all sorts of provisions, which I have already said the enemy had there lain up, and placed a garrison in it. From hence our army marched on to Brussels ; from which town the elector of Bavaria, and his court, had retired after the last battle, in which he shared no laurels with the marshal, as he had hoped : wherefore, the town being summoned by a letter from the Duke of Marlborough and the deputies of the States, opened her gates and submitted to King Charles. Malines, or Mechlin, followed this example, as did Lire, situated on the Nethe, and strongly fortified.

The elector of Bavaria, who had no settled place since his and the marshal's defeat, seemed determined to stand the allies behind the Scheld, near Ghent, with the troops he had saved; but they did not give him time to intrench himself, for they decamped from Grimbergen on the 30th, passed by Alost, and being advanced as far as Meerbeek, they heard that the enemy had abandoned the lines in Flanders, and retired behind their old lines, near Merien and Courtray. While the army was on their march, I joined it, being entirely recovered. On this advice, Ghent was summoned, which surrendered to Major-general Cadogan, on condition that their privileges should be preserved. General Fagel possessed himself of Bruges, on the same terms; and, without striking a stroke, made himself master of Dam, a small, but a very strong town, and of the castle of Rodenhuis, or Red-house. After the enemy had abandoned all their lines in the country of Waas, the garrison of Antwerp making a show of defence, General Cadogan marched thither with twelve hundred men, and summoned the place. After many parleys, it was at last agreed that the garrison should march out on the 7th of June, with arms and baggage, drums beating, colours flying, four mortars, and as many cannon. The next day the French also evacuated Fort Pearl, Fort Mary, and Fort Philip, situated on the Scheld, and near to Antwerp. Even Oudenard, a strong fortified town on the same river, between four and five leagues distant from Ghent, being summoned on the 1st of June, surrendered on composition the next day, the Marquis de Bournonville seeing four pieces of cannon mounted on a battery. Thus the winning of one single battle, reduced in a few days, all Brabant, and a great part of Flanders, to the obedience of King Charles.

That the fruit of such a successful opening of a campaign might not be lost, the Duke of Marlborough went to the Hague, to consult the States-general on the plan of military expeditions, and returned to the camp on the 13th of June, when he immediately invested Ostend by land, while Admiral Fairborn blocked it up by sea with nine men-of-war, and four bombketches. We could not entirely enclose the town, without taking Fort de Plasendaal, raised on the canal of Bruges; General Fagel attacked this with such resolution, that the garrison, consisting of two hundred and fifty men, was made prisoners of war. The fire upon the town, both from the land and sea, was so terrible, that it capitulated on the 6th of July; she had, under the government of the Archduke Albert, held out a three years' siege, and now hardly so many days. The garrison was suffered to march out with their swords, and then only on condition that they should not, of six months, bear arms against King Charles, or his allies.

After the reduction of Ostend, our army encamped with the right at Wellem, the left at Harlebeck. Hither the town of Courtray sent deputies to the generals to make submission, the French having abandoned it, after having exacted large contributions. Brigadier Meredith went to blockade, and try if he could reduce it by famine, while the grand army undertook the siege of Menin, with two hundred pieces of cannon, great and small, brought from Maestricht and Holland. General Salisch, who had the direction of this important siege, invested the place the 22nd of July; which, though called the key of France, held out but eighteen days after our trenches were opened, and surrendered upon terms in a month after it was invested. We lost a great many men in this siege; I was myself exposed to no danger but when my husband was, whom I always followed, and whom I would never abandon, wherever he went. While the army stayed here to fill up the works, and repair the breaches, General Churchill was detached with six battalions, and the same number of squadrons, to reduce Dendermond, which made a more obstinate resistance than was expected. The general acquitted himself so well of his commission, that this town, which was almost inaccessible, surrendered on the 5th of September.

The siege of Ath was next undertaken, by Field-marshal Ouwerkerke, or Auverquerque, with forty battalions and thirty squadrons. General Ingoldsby broke ground on the 20th, at night, with the loss of one man only; for, the enemy imagining we should open our trenches on the side where the Lord Auverquerque was, had drawn their strength to that quarter, to prevent, or impede, his works. Our men covered themselves before they discovered their mistake. When my husband marched with General Ingoldsby to the side where they were to break ground, he left me boiling the pot, with which I designed to regale him and the officers of his regiment. When my meat was ready, I covered it with cloths so close that no steam could get out, and, venturing through a village belonging to the enemy, in which I ran the hazard of being killed or stripped, by a circuit of five miles, I got safe, with my provisions on my head, to the trench. It was a fatiguing journey, the way being difficult to find, and the night being very dark: but what danger will deter a woman who truly loves her husband? having found mine, I set my broth and meat before him; he invited his colonel, and other officers, who were not a little surprised at the risk I had run, and that I could bring it so hot such a length of way. Lord Auverquerque, who was come to thank the officers and soldiers for their diligence, stood talking to some of the former, when I, looking through the sand-bags, saw a soldier, who, ignorant of our being on the side we were, came out of the town to gather turnips. I took a piece out of one of our people's hand, and called to an officer to see me shoot him; for we had pushed our trenches within thirty-three paces of the palisades. I suppose we were just then perceived; for the instant I killed the man, a musket-shot, from the town, came through the sand-bags, split my under lip, beat one of my teeth into my mouth, and knocked me down. Both this shot and mine, with which I killed the soldier, were so exactly at a time, that none could distinguish whether I fell by the recoiling of the piece, or the enemy's ball. My husband, and some of his comrades, ran to take me up, and seeing me bloody, imagined I was shot through the head; but I convinced them to the contrary, by spitting the ball and tooth into my hand. General Ingoldsby sent for his surgeon, who sewed up my lip, and took care of me in the cure. Lord Auverquerque, who had seen what had passed, made me a present of five pistoles, and told me, he was sorry that the pains I had taken, in providing refreshment for my husband and his officers, had been attended with such a misfortune. I stayed in the trench till the next night, when our regiment, for so I call that of my husband, being relieved by another, marched off. In a few days the breaches were so wide, that the besieged beat the chamade in the afternoon of the 30th of September, but all terms were refused them, and the garrison, consisting of two thousand one hundred men, on the 2nd of October, were obliged to surrender prisoners of war: the officers, however, were allowed their swords and baggage. The reduction of this town put an end to the campaign of 1706, in the Low Countries. We joined the grand army, which, under the Duke of Marlborough, covered the siege, and in a fortnight after, moved to St. Quintin-Lennick, in order to separate, and march into winter-quarters. Our regiment was quartered in Ghent, where I was delivered of a child before my time, which lived about half a year. Rather than live upon the spend, an idle life, I hired myself to Mr. Dupper, who, since, kept a tavern on Fish-street-hill, and was then head sutler, to be under the cook. While I was in this service, the cook had one day orders to dress something for Mr. Stone, the surgeon, which was ready for the table, when Lieutenant St. Leger, of General Evans's regiment of foot, came into the kitchen, and would have it for himself; the cook would not yield to it, and the lieutenant knocked him down; I was then in my back kitchen washing my dishes, and seeing the brutality of the action, it raised my spirits, I ran to the lieutenant, collared him, threw up his heels, and, in the fall, he broke his leg. Mr. Dupper, Mr. Stone, and several others ran in to know the grounds of this scuffle, which, upon hearing, every one allowed me to have been in the right. Mr. Stone refused to set his leg, which was done by a French surgeon, but after such a bungling manner, that it was an eyesore to his dying day; no small mortification to him, who was a tall, strong, well-made, black man, had a very handsome face, and a genteel, easy shape; all which, he needed nobody to tell him, for he had no small opinion of himself. He was descended from Sir Anthony St. Leger, who possessed an estate, as I have heard, of ten thousand a year in Kent, which he very much impaired in the service of King Charles I., whose cause he strenuously asserted against his rebellious subjects. This lieutenant was not a little proud of his family, though I have heard among the officers, what ground they had for it I can't say, that his father was but a merry-begotten son of Sir Anthony's; but this, others have contradicted, and given for reason, that King Charles II. put our lieutenant's father and brother into the Charterhouse. The gentleman I am speaking of was haughty, morose, and vain: I believe he did not want courage, notwithstanding he was very much of the bully, a gamester, a known setter, and a sharper at play. His misfortune became a standing jest; for whenever he was quarrelsome in company, he was menaced with me. Some years after, I met him in the Tilt-yard coffee-house, where a gentleman asked him if he knew me ; he answered, he had seen my face somewhere. Why, said the other, have you forgot Kit Welsh, who broke your leg ? He then looked more earnestly at me, but said no more than, D——n her, she is strangely altered, she is grown fat. 'Tis true, said I, in my person I am altered, but not in my temper ; for, should I see you knock down, as you did, a man of much inferior strength, as was our cook, I might, perhaps, give you another broken leg : he returned me some curses, which he could do as well as any officer in the army (for he swore a round hand), and left the coffee-house.

During my stay in Ghent, the Dutch woman with whom I found my husband at Breda, whom he had promised never more to see, the condition on which I forgave his lubricity, had the confidence to take a lodging opposite to ours, and one day, just when I had prepared dinner, inveigled him to an alehouse. I knew not where he was, and being impatient, went out to look him, and was informed by a neighbour, that he was at such an alehouse with his mistress. This news setting me in a flame, I ran directly thither, and saw them sitting in a box, the woman outermost. My rage was so great, that I struck at her with a case knife I had undesignedly brought out in my hand, and cut her nose off close to the face, except a small part of the skin, by which it hung. My husband leaping over the table, ran to the main guard for a surgeon, who sewed it on again ; but the wound, however, disfigured her, and I ran for an officer to secure them both. My husband, by order of the colonel, was confined, and reprimanded very severely, and, had I not interposed when my passion was over, he had been made run the gantelope : as he was confined during my pleasure, I was no sooner cool but I procured his liberty. His dulcinea did not come off at as easy a rate, for she was put into a turning-stool, and whirled round till she was dizzy, and so sick that she emptied her stomach. This stool is like a round cage, big enough to hold one person, fixed upon a spindle, and being only railed in, the criminal is exposed to the ridicule of all the bystanders. After she had undergone this punishment, she was, with great ceremony, conducted out of the gates of the town. I own the violence of my temper, which is a very jealous one, pushed me on too far in this business, for I am satisfied, in the place where I found them, they could not wrong me ; and, indeed, I have reason to believe my husband never injured me with women from the time I found him. To say the truth, I can tax his memory with nothing but an unhappy itch to play, which he could not be broke of, though it almost broke me, and was the only cause of uneasiness that I ever had all the time I was his wife. The woman who raised my jealousy, married at Groningen ; I often afterwards met her, and was as well pleased, as she was mortified, at the figure she made by the amputation of her nose, and its being stitched on again.

Soon after my rough treatment of my husband's quondam mistress, a man and a woman were executed for a barbarous murder. He was married to a very handsome woman at Oudenard, by whom he had had three children, and she was, at the time he perpetrated this villany, big of the fourth. The female criminal was his servant, a very pretty girl, but not to be put in competition with his wife, though he gave her the preference. He carried on an intrigue with this wench, and that he might do it without control, resolved to take his wife off by poison, which he accordingly prepared, and bade the wench put it into her mistress's water-gruel, then went to Ghent. She punctually performed this order, and it had the dire effect proposed : the poor woman swelled amazingly, and was in the utmost torture ; her little boy, about nine years old, hearing his mother cry out in her agonies, ran and brought her relations ; but no remedy could relieve her, and it being evident that she was poisoned, the maid was secured, who, in prison, to excuse herself, said she had put something into her mistress's water-gruel, which was given her by her master to that end. Upon this confession, four men, one of which was the unhappy wife's brother, were appointed to watch his return to the town, which was about sunset. He was immediately seized, and clapped into a separate prison, and, in a few days, the whole truth was sifted out ; on which they were condemned, and the next day executed ; the maid was beheaded, and the master broke upon the wheel. The execution over, they were hung up in iron chains, the woman by the heels, the man by the neck.

As this year, 1706, was remarkable for the memorable march of Prince Eugene to, and raising the siege of Turin, I believe I shall not displease my readers by taking a step into Italy, and giving a short account of the situation of affairs in Savoy ; where the French had spoiled that Duke of the greater part of his country. On the 29th of September they invested Turin, but the court of Versailles being of opinion that their troops in Piedmont were not sufficient, they withdrew from thence on the 10th of October, and attempted Asti ; but failing there, they made themselves amends by the reduction of Nice, which the Duke of Berwick invested the 31st of October, and took by capitulation on the 4th of January of this year.

During the winter, 1705, the King of France had made such preparations for the reduction of the capital of Savoy, as were amazing, and gave every one ground to believe his success infallible. The duke, on the other hand, notwithstanding the French had possessed themselves of so many of his towns, did not lose courage, but did everything that a brave and prudent prince ought for the defence of his country ; employing the subsidies he drew from England and Holland, in well storing his metropolis with provision and ammunition, in repairing the old, and adding new fortifications. The town being invested about the middle of May, was assaulted and defended with equal and surprising bravery, though with different success on either side. While, at Turin, they were furiously intent upon the taking and retaking the outworks, Prince Eugene began his march for Italy with the imperial army, greatly reinforced by the auxiliary troops of England and Holland. All that the Duke of Vendome could do to impede his march, proved fruitless ; he broke through all the obstacles the French threw in his way, and subsisted his army in the midst of an enemy's country, which he was obliged to cross ; passed several large rivers, and, in thirty-four marches, joined the Duke of Savoy on the 1st of September, within four leagues of Turin. The extremity to which this city was reduced, hastening their preparations, the army crossed the Doria on the 6th, with design to attack the enemy the next morning, as they did, marching up to the trench, reserving their own, and receiving their fire at the very foot of their intrenchments, where they fell upon them with such fury, and so close and terrible a fire, that nothing could withstand them. The French, driven from trench to trench, and pursued with a cruel slaughter, abandoned all their artillery and ammunition, and sought their safety in their flight. This glorious victory not only delivered the capital, but retrieved what the duke had lost, and was followed by the submission of the Milanese to King Charles III.

We are now come to the year 1707, in which Marshal Villars forced the lines of Stolhossen, on the Upper Rhine, got a considerable booty, took two hundred pieces of cannon, opened himself a passage into Germany, and exacted contribution on all hands. The consternation thus caused, made the Court of Vienna strenuously solicit the States-general and the electors, to send immediate succours for the defence of the empire, and offer the command of the imperial army, as generalissimo, to the elector of Hanover, the late King George, who accepted it at the solicitation of Queen Anne and the States-general; but nothing more was done on the Upper Rhine this campaign, than observing the motions of one another.

The Duke of Marlborough arrived at the Hague on the 12th of May, and from thence, without loss of time, he set out for the army encamped at Lembeek. The attention of all being turned on the siege of Toulon, where the allies miscarried, nothing of importance was done this campaign in the Low Countries; wherefore, as the battle of Almanza was fought this year, my reader will forgive me if I turn his eyes upon Spain, where the allies having raised the siege of Barcelona, penetrated as far as Madrid, which King Philip abandoned and went to head the succours sent him by France, as he declared in his manifesto; which succours were so considerable, that, being joined with the troops that had been compelled to raise the siege of Barcelona, and had marched through Navarre into Castile, his army was stronger than that of the allies by twenty-five squadrons and thirteen battalions, besides the inhabitants of the country, who had taken up arms in his cause. Wherefore the allies seeing that King Charles continued still in Aragon, thought proper to quit this capital in their turn. King Charles at length joined the army on the 8th of August, with two regiments of horse and three battalions; but it was too late, they had let slip the opportunity, and the best they could now do, was to march to the frontiers of Valencia and Murcia, and so to distribute the winter-quarters as to be able to cover those two kingdoms, with Aragon and Catalonia. King Charles, with a few troops, withdrew to Barcelona; and on his retreat, the French took in a great number of towns, castles, and forts, which had deserted from King Philip upon the raising the siege of Barcelona. In the spring, it was resolved in a council held in Valencia, to assemble in one body all the troops, and by the way of Aragon to penetrate into Castile, and destroy the magazines which the enemy had made on the frontiers. The whole army took the field on the 6th of April, to put the project in execution. The number of the allies were fifty-three squadrons and forty-two battalions, which having destroyed the enemy's magazines at Baudera, Yela, and Montalegre, they besieged the Castle of Villena; but before any breach made, the enemy, having, near Almanza, formed a body of seventy-six squadrons, and fifty-four battalions, were preparing to march, and join seven or eight thousand French under the command of the Duke of Orleans. As the allies did not imagine the enemy so strong, it was resolved, in a council of war held the 24th, to attack them before their proposed junction; accordingly they began their march the next morning, and about noon, coming on the plain in sight of the enemy, these latter raised their piquet, and ranged in order of battle before the town of Almanza. The English and Dutch, who began the fight, notwithstanding they behaved with as much bravery as men could do, were twice repulsed, and the enemy obtained a complete victory. About three thousand were taken prisoners; the better part of the foot was cut to pieces, and the few that remained passed the Ebro under the conduct of Lord Galway and the Marquis de las Minas. The havoc made of the allies had been much greater, and possibly no quarters had been given, if the Duke of Berwick had not interposed.

After this signal victory, the conquerors found no difficulty to make themselves masters of Requina, and of almost all the kingdom of Valencia; and dividing their army into three corps, that under the Duke of Orleans took in Calatayud, and on the 25th of May appeared before Saragossa. The garrison the allies left there, withdrew the night before into Catalonia, so that the town came to the best terms they could with the duke, who put into it two thousand men. The Chevalier d'Asfeld, who commanded the second corps, after having taken Xativa sword in hand, left the castle invested, to join the troops which the Bishop of Murcia had set on foot, and to besiege Alicant. In the interim, the Earl of Galway, having drawn out the garrisons of several places, had taken post behind the Segre, and, to maintain it, began to raise trenches and redoubts from Tortosa even beyond Lerida, but the Duke of Berwick, with a third body, having joined the Duke of Orleans, it was resolved, notwithstanding the excessive heats, to dislodge the English generals, to cross the Ebro, and to penetrate into Catalonia. The cannon being arrived, they placed it on the bank of the Cinca; made so strong a fire upon four squadrons posted on the other side, that they were obliged to retire: after which the enemy crossed the river, and Fraga having been abandoned by the garrison, they had no obstacle to hinder them from besieging Lerida. The fortifications of this place were in fine repair; and three thousand English, who were in garrison, had had the precaution to destroy the houses, gardens, and trees, that were in the neighbourhood. The violent heats being over, the Duke of Orleans sent his foot before, on the 10th of September, and followed them with the horse a few days after; but they spent near a month in making preparations for the siege: the trenches were not opened till the 2nd of October. Notwithstanding the besieged made a gallant defence, the assailants pushed forward their works. On the 12th the breach was large enough to attack the covered way, where the besiegers made a lodgment, after an obstinate and bloody dispute of two full hours. This obliged the garrison to retire to the castle, before which the trenches were opened on the 16th, at night, though it was opposed by some general officer, who opined for a blockade, because the season was far advanced, and that the Earl of Galway was on his march to succour the besieged: but the precaution taken to guard all the passes, rendered his attempt fruitless. The Duke of Orleans having carried the outworks sword in hand the 1st of November, made several mines, and battered the main body of the place. The garrison being thus straitened, capitulated on the 10th, and was allowed all military honours, and to be conducted to Lord Galway the nearest way; besides, a free pardon was granted to the inhabitants.

The siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, in the kingdom of Leon, was next undertaken, and taken on capitulation. The winter drawing on, the Spaniards not having provided what was necessary for new enterprises, nothing more was done in Catalonia this campaign. In Flanders, as I have before said, the French and allies were in a manner inactive; though the former was, at home, secretly employed in preparing for the execution of a project, which had it succeeded, would have quite disconcerted the latter, and have made Lewis XIV. triumph for all his enemies; but as secret as were his preparations, they were discovered by the Dutch, who gave the Queen of England advice by a fishing-boat, that the design was formed, and everything in readiness to make a descent on some part of her dominions in favour of the Pretender. The event proved, that the States-general were not imposed upon in the intelligence they had received; for the French embarked twelve battalions on board a sufficient number of ships, with everything necessary; some thousands of spare arms, and four millions of livres. On the 5th of March, 1708, the king went to St. Germain's to take his leave of the Pretender, and, in wishing him a happy issue, made him a present of a sword set with diamonds, worth fifty thousand livres, desiring him to remember that it was a French sword. Having made a suitable compliment to the king, the Pretender took his leave of the dauphin and the other princes of the blood, and that very day set out for Dunkirk, from whence he set sail the 17th, at night, with a number of volunteers, big with the hopes of being joined by such malcontents in Scotland, where he designed to land, as were averse to the Union, and with the troops which followed, and the assistance of such Scots, to submit the whole kingdom of Great Britain.

The designs of France being timely discovered, the English and States-general soon got ready a fleet of forty men-of-war under the command of the late Lord Torrington, who, with all the sail they could crowd, followed the French, having advice of their departure and course. In the mean while some English troops drawn out of the garrisons of Flanders, were sent to England by the way of Ostend. The Pretender came to an anchor near Edinburgh; fired the number of cannon agreed upon with his partisans; and hoped the signal would raise some thousands of malcontents, who would take arms to support his pretensions. On the certain assurances made him of an insurrection, preparations were making to disembark his troops, but the English, by a great deal an over-match for the French, appearing in sight, suspended the landing. A council was held, in which it was resolved to send three ships close to the town to land their troops in case they perceived any commotion in their favour; but these having the mortification to find none moved, but to repel them in the attempt, they were obliged to drop the enterprise, and make the best of their way to the coast of France. They were chased by the English, and the Salisbury taken. Thus the Pretender returned to Dunkirk the beginning of April, and all his hopes were dissipated like smoke; the unsuccessful project only served to irritate the allies against France, and brought them to a resolution of acting with more vigour than they had yet done. To this end the Duke of Marlborough, who had made a tour into Germany, set out for Brabant on the 3rd of May, and before the end of the month had drawn the army together. The French also, on their side, assembled their forces, and the Dukes of Burgundy and Berry, who were to command this year, accompanied by the Pretender and Count Thoulouse, arrived at the camp. After many motions, the allies encamped near Louvain, the French at Genap and Braine la Leuze; both armies intrenching as if they designed to try which would be first weary of staying; but on a sudden, when none expected it, the French, on the 4th of July, at night, sent away sixteen thousand men, who marched by the way of Enghien to Alost, and broke all the bridges behind them on the Dender. The body of their army coming to Halle, orders were sent to the above detachment to march with all speed to Ninove, and from thence the following night to Ghent, each horseman with a foot soldier behind him; they arrived as the gates were opening, and having forced the guard of burghers, made themselves masters of the town; upon which the garrison, not being strong enough to make any defence, immediately capitulated. At the same time the Count de la Motte, who was in Walloon Flanders, marching with a body of thirteen thousand men, and some pieces of cannon, to Bruges, found the town unprovided with troops, and seized upon it on the 6th of this same month; after which, he carried Fort Plassendal sword in hand.

At the first intelligence of the march of the French, the allies pursued them with all possible expedition, and even fell upon their rearguard, but could not prevent their continuing their march; wherefore, on advice of the loss of these three places, they marched with all speed towards Oudenard, to meet with the enemy, between the Scheld and the Lis, on their return to the frontiers of France, and force them to a battle. To this end Monsieur Rantzau and General Cadogan were detached to secure the pass of Lessines, while the army bent its march the same way. On the 11th, about noon, these officers discovered the French army intrenched below Oudenard, on a ground encumbered with hedges and bushes. They immediately gave notice of it to the grand army, and had orders sent back to attack them without losing a minute's time. They accordingly charged them at the village, whence they drove them with great slaughter. The rest of the army having passed the Scheld, formed themselves as they advanced, and began the fight about four o'clock, with a great deal of resolution, but the foot only engaged, the hedges and hollow ways hindering the horse from coming in for any share in the action. The French were driven from hedge to hedge, and everywhere trodden under foot; however, they behaved very gallantly, and disputed every inch of ground, till, being taken in the rear by eighteen battalions and some horse, they began to lose courage, quitted the field, where they left a great number of their dead, and taking advantage of the night, fled in great disorder, and sheltered themselves under the cannon of Ghent. We could not have obtained a more complete victory. We soon after moved to Courtray; there Colonel Cholinondeley's men, who lay without the town, near the palisades, were drawn up to be reviewed by their officers, while I was going into the town to purchase provisions for my tent. The colonel, who was of a gay, lively temper, and pretty much of what we call the wag, seeing me go into the town, waited for my coming out, that he might divert himself by teasing me, which he did not a little delight in. I carried my provisions on a mare; the colonel had a small black stonehorse, which, when he saw me returning, he turned loose, and the horse, like a brute as he was, began to be very rude with my poor beast, and in his rough courtship broke me four bottles of wine. I was so irritated at this, that having driven away his unmannerly tit, I pursued the colonel with stones, but he eluded my anger by his flight, and told the officers, that his stonehorse had an amour with Kit Welsh. Some time after this, as I was upon my mare, in a dress convenient for my vocation, Mr.

Montgomery, captain of the grenadiers in Lord Orkney's regiment, began to ridicule my habit, and make a jest of my poor beast. I offered to run her against his horse for a pistole, and we would both ride. Brigadier Godfrey, who was by, laid another pistole on my side. We both went to the place chosen to run upon, and starting at the beat of drum, placed to give the signal, he suffered me to keep pace with him some time, but finding he was going to leave me, I made a furious push at him, flung man and horse into a ditch, and thus won the race. The brigadier laughed heartily at my stratagem, the captain was half angry, but I got a couple of pistoles (for the brigadier gave me that he had won), and did not much concern myself, nor should I have given myself any trouble had he been irritated, for I may safely say, I had as little fear about me as any man in the army.

The allies having received a re-enforcement of German troops which had followed Prince Eugene from the Moselle to the Low Countries, possessed themselves of the lines the French had thrown up to cover Walloon Flanders; extended their contributions as far as the gates of Arras, and made preparations to lay siege to Lisle. As soon as the heavy cannon and a convoy of five thousand waggons laden with provision and ammunition, which Prince Eugene himself escorted with a body of forty thousand men, were arrived, the town was invested on the 1st of August. It was abundantly supplied with everything necessary to hold out a long siege; and Marshal Boufflers, who commanded in it, had with him ten thousand, some said thirteen thousand men. The trenches were opened the 11th, at night, and the works were carried on without intermission, while the grand army observed that of the French, which was daily re-enforced: for as the siege employed the whole strength of the allies, they could safely disgarnish most of their towns; besides which they received a strong re-enforcement led by the Duke of Berwick out of Germany; so that their army consisted of a hundred and twenty-six battalions and two hundred and eight squadrons. With these considerable forces, they marched by the way of Orchies, Bergues, and Pevele towards Phalempin, and having taken out of Douay thirty pieces of heavy cannon, they drew near the allies the 5th of September, whom, though re-enforced the night before by a detachment of seventy-seven squadrons from the army carrying on the siege, every one expected they would attack : but the Duke of Marlborough soon discovering that they designed only to retard the siege, ordered the tents to be pitched, fortified his camp with the utmost care, and sent back to the siege a part of the troops he had received from thence. In the interim of these motions, the besiegers having pushed as far as the glacis of the counterscarp, four thousand grenadiers, beside those who were employed in the works, were commanded to give the assault, which began at night on the 9th of September, and a most furious one it was. The enemies' fire from their outworks, which were not yet demolished, made a dismal havoc, and certainly this was the most bloody action that ever was seen ; the assailants, notwithstanding, made several lodgments on the covered way, spite of the gallant resistance of the besieged.

There were some English and Dutch troops posted in the market-town called Entrieres, where they had intrenched themselves : these the Duke of Vendome cannonaded with forty pieces of cannon, which made us all conclude he would at length come to a battle : but he, secretly decamping on the 15th, lined the Scheld from Tournay to Ghent, and the canal from thence to Bruges ; by which he cut off all the convoys the allies might have had from the frontier towns, except from Ostend. Eight thousand English were landed at this port, with a great quantity of powder and provision, and stores of all sorts, a great part of which had already been received by the besiegers. As the remainder was still considerable, and was every day increasing by fresh supplies from England, Major-general Webb and Count Nassau-Woudenburg were detached with thirty battalions to escort it ; my husband was in this detachment, whom I followed, and the Duke of Marlborough advanced beyond Menin, almost as far as Marquette, to be at hand to sustain us. We were joined by a second detachment of twelve battalions and twenty-eight squadrons, and met the convoy at Hoogleden, where we had advice that Monsieur la Motte was marching with a body of twenty-three thousand men and better, to attack it near Wenendal ; upon which news our men were immediately formed into two lines, at the issue of the defile near the castle of Wenendal, and our generals posted, on each side, a regiment in the coppice, with orders to lie snug, and not to fire till they were sure of taking the enemy in flank. Hardly was this disposition made before the enemy appeared in sight. They formed the infantry into four lines, and the horse in as many, and entered the defile to attack the escort; but they were no sooner within our ambush but they were saluted with a general discharge on either hand, which put their right and left into a thorough disorder; they, however, formed again very soon, and even made two battalions give way a little, but Albemarle's regiment coming up to oppose their passage directly in their front, kept them in play, and gave time to make some fresh troops advance. Seeing themselves attacked in front, and open on the flanks to an incessant fire, the two wings were forced in disorder up their centre, and all of them returning the way they had come, hastened out of the defile, where they left four thousand of their dead, and some pieces of cannon. The French general not being able to lead on his third attack, was obliged to retreat, and suffer the convoy to pass. We had not above six or seven thousand men, so that they were above three to one. The conduct of General Webb greatly contributed to this victory, which, however, he paid dear for by the wounds he received. I got a fine bay horse with silver-capped pistols and laced housings and pistol-bags. I sold my horse to Colonel Hamilton for nine pistoles; my pistols to Captain Brown for five crowns; and the lace of my furniture, excepting what I reserved to lace the knees of my husband's breeches, to a Jew, at five livres an ounce.

The safe arrival of this convoy, was a subject of great joy to the allies, who must have raised the siege had it miscarried. As they began to want powder in the town, notwithstanding the care that was taken to store it with all necessaries in abundance, the French endeavoured to supply them with a good number of bags, which their horse carried behind them. This enterprise was undertaken the very night after the battle of Wenendal. A detachment was made of three small bodies of horse, with green boughs in their hats, which was the distinction of our troops; the first party succeeded in this stratagem, and calling themselves Germans, had the good fortune to get into the town; the second, being discovered, were all blown up, by our fire taking their powder, or made prisoners; and the third returned back the way they were coming.

The besiegers having, though with the loss of a great many brave fellows, made their way, on the 3rd of October attacked the half-moon at noon-day: they carried the work, but before they could lodge themselves, the fire from the town killed two hundred and fifty of their men; they kept the post notwithstanding. The siege was carried on with such resolution, that on the 22nd the governor found himself under a necessity of hanging out a white ensign. The town, after the capitulations were signed, was surrendered to the allies. Seventeen hundred French horse were conducted to Douay. The rest of the garrison, which was six thousand men, retired into the citadel, which was surrounded with a double ditch and a number of outworks.

During this siege, which was not more bravely attacked than defended, as I was one day a foraging, I entered a chateau, deserted by the enemy, and found in it a basket of eggs, and another of cocks and hens (in the camp language, corporals and their wives), which I made free with; the eggs I presented to the Duke of Argyle, and the fowls to some officers. The next day I returned to the same place, and got corn, hay, and straw, for my mare. The third visit I made with a resolution to search more narrowly, for something of greater consequence, but some of our men had been there, and deceived my hopes; for I could meet with nothing more valuable than what I had before carried off; therefore I was forced to content myself with provender for my mare. In the time I was searching, some of the French army came in upon me, and took both myself, my mare, and my forage. The soldiers were quarrelling about the right to my clothes, when their officer came in, whom by good fortune I knew. He asked me, what had brought me thither, and who I was. I answered, that I thought he ought to know me, being a son of Captain Maclaughings of Clare's regiment (for I was in man's clothes); Well now, honey, said he, I vawsh not after knowing you before, but give my humble service to my cushin and naamshake; but heark'ye now, joy, are you Richard or John? Fait, said I, in the brogue, I am Richard. Well, now, cushin, replied he, what will I do for you; but indeed, honey, nobody shall meddle wid your tings, joy, but go in te name of Cott. I made the best of my way to the Duke of Argyle's quarters, where I found his grace and the Lord Mark Kerr at chess. I asked them with some warmth, in a language which only became a soldier, and a freedom allowed my sex, what they meant by having no better intelligence, and idling their time at chess while the French were on the point of cannonading us. I had, in returning from my chateau, observed all the hedges lined and the cannon ready to play upon us. The Lord Mark Kerr, surprised to see his grace pay any regard to what I had said, told him, I was a foolish drunken woman, and not worth notice: to which the duke replied, he would as soon take my advice as that of any brigadier in the army. He then asked me my reasons: I told him, and had hardly done it, when he found my intelligence true, and that we had scarce time to get into the lines for safety. Sir Richard Temple's and How's regiments were ordered to clear the hedges, and the duke would have gone with them, and probably never returned, had I not prevented him by keeping back his horse; for both these regiments were cut to pieces before our horse and train of artillery came up, which soon drove them to the main body of their army. The enemy cannonaded the Duke of Argyle's quarters so soon, that there was no making a bed for him there; and he was obliged to take up with one of straw of my making, and Colonel Campbell for a chum. They had no candles, but I had two of wax taken out of a priest's house, and hung up one over their heads in a paper lantern. Here they slept very comfortably, and I took the opportunity to steal the duke's wine for the poor fellows upon the guard, who I thought wanted it to comfort them: I had left but two bottles, which occasioned the duke's butler making a great uproar. In the morning his grace gave me a pistole for my early intelligence, and at night I spent it on two of his servants, at a house of civil conversation, where one of them was received with so warm an affection, that he must be ungrateful if he ever forgets it, for the favour she bestowed on him was of a lasting sort. I don't care to mention his name, but he was coachman to the Duke of Roxburgh within this century.

At the siege of the city, Taylor the corporal, whose eye I struck out in defence of my pig, having received the company's money, instead of paying them, lost it at play, and then desperately shot himself through the head.

The fifth day after the reduction of Lisle, Lord Auverquerque died; he was field-marshal of the States-general, and son to Elizabeth, Countess de Horne, and Lewis de Nassau, Lord of Lecq, Beverwaert, and Odyk, natural son of Maurice, Prince of Orange, by Mademoiselle de Malines.

The French were masters of the Scheld and the canal of Bruges, and had not only broken down the banks near that town, but had cut several dikes to drown the country from the Scheld, and were strongly intrenched on that river to prevent the passage of the allies, and to favour the siege of Brussels, which the Duke of Bavaria undertook the 23rd of November, with a body of about sixteen or seventeen thousand men drawn from the garrison towns on the Scheld and the Maes. The garrison consisted of five thousand men, under the command of Monsieur de Paseal, who, being summoned, refused to surrender, made the necessary dispositions for a vigorous defence, and by a letter acquainted the Duke of Marlborough with the danger he was in. His grace, on the 14th, at the head of a hundred squadrons and fifty battalions, and Prince Eugene with nineteen battalions and fifty squadrons, marched to the Scheld to force a passage spite of the enemy's intrenchments. This march was so secret that the French had not notice of the allies directing towards the Scheld, though they had received advice of their crossing the Lis. The Count de Lottum, on the 17th, about four in the morning, arrived with the vanguard near to Harlebeck river, and instantly laid two bridges, led over his troops, and drew up in order of battle. The Duke of Marlborough, who had found means to pass the river at Kirkhoven, attacked the enemy so briskly at Berchem, that two hundred were slain, six hundred made prisoners, and the rest, with Monsieur Souternon, their commander, put to flight. The other French troops, posted near Oudenard, under the command of Monsieur Hautefort, soon followed the example of their companions. Thus were rendered fruitless these intrenchments, which had cost the French so much care and fatigue; and the allies, beside a great quantity of stores, provisions, and baggage, with two standards and a pair of kettle-drums, which fell into their hands, had a free passage to march to the relief of Brussels; to which I must now return.

The trenches were opened before it on the 13th; on the 15th the Duke of Bavaria began to batter the town with great fury, between the gates of Namur and Louvain: at ten o'clock at night five or six thousand men attacked the covered way. The regiment of Dodignies, and the hussars, who defended it, resolutely stood the assault, which was repeated no less than nine times, and the fight having lasted till six in the morning, they left the covered way, and in their turn, falling in with the besiegers, retook all the posts they had lost, and made a prodigious slaughter of the enemy, whom they drove almost to their trenches. It was reported as a certainty, that the besiegers lost in this action two thousand five hundred men, and the besieged eight hundred. The next day the elector did nothing farther than batter the town; but all the spies agreed in their account of his being resolved to give a general assault the night following, and to cannonade the town with red balls, to make an insurrection of the burghers. Necessary dispositions were immediately made to repel the enemy, and to prevent the threatened conflagration. About eleven at night, when every one expected the signal for the assault, news was brought that the whole camp of the enemy was in motion; and soon after that, they having had advice of the passing the Scheld by the allies, decamped with such precipitation that they left behind them their wounded, to the number of eight hundred men, sixteen pieces of cannon, four mortars, and a great deal of baggage, to retreat to Namur.

After the pass of the Rhine, and the raising the siege of Brussels, the allies divided their forces into several corps, that they might more easily subsist, secure a passage over the river, and cut off all the succours that the enemy might endeavour to throw into the citadel of Lisle; against which the trenches were opened on the 18th of October, and as the besiegers wanted powder, the works were carried on by sapping. As soon as they had made themselves masters of the glacis of the first counterscarp, they there fixed their batteries, and mounted their cannon on the third of November, at night. After having taken several posts, they at last carried the second counterscarp, and mounted on it four pieces of battering cannon to play on the small work near the halfmoon: thus far they had proceeded when Prince Eugene arrived. He commanded the sap to be continued, without firing a single gun to make a breach; for which reason, when everything was in readiness, on the 8th of December, the governor beat the chamade.

The capitulation being signed the next day, Prince Eugene and the Prince of Orange, stadtholder, or stadhouder of Frise, made a visit to Marshal Boufflers, in the citadel, where they were received with a salute from the French cannon, and the marshal kept them company, when they returned. Next day the garrison marched out, following their baggage; the marshal, who was in the rear, conversed near half an hour with the Prince of Frise: all the officers saluted him with their half pikes, which salutes he returned with his hat.

The Duke of Marlborough, after the siege of Brussels was raised, encamped at Alost. While we were here, I observed an officer, who, by his laced clothes, I conjectured to be one of the guards, strolling backwards and forwards in the intervals of the camp; I fancied he had a mind to steal some of our horses, and for that reason watched him narrowly; at length I saw him lead off a mare, belonging to a poor woman, into a ditch, and with her commit, by means of the bank, the most detestable sin that can enter into the thoughts of man. Colonel Irwin and another officer, both of Ingoldsby's regiment, happening at that instant to pass by, caught him in the fact, seized and gave him into the custody of the provost, where he remained till the duke, who had left the army, returned, when he was tried, condemned to the gallows, and executed accordingly. As some of my readers may not know the provost's office, it will not be amiss to tell them that he attends the camp, and all offenders are put under his care, for which reason he commands a strong guard which goes everywhere with him; and the camp colour-men, who always precede the army, escorted by the forlorn hope, choose the strongest house they can meet with for his quarters, that he may secure his prisoners. When we march, the less criminals are handcuffed in the middle of a guard; but notorious ones are chained hand and foot, and put into the bread-waggons. The mare which this officer was enamoured with, was shot; but the duke first paid the poor woman who owned her, the full value.

Notwithstanding our army was extremely fatigued with the number of motions; that the fruits of our campaign were sufficient to cover our generals with glory; that winter was already begun, and the frosts very sharp, we, who imagined it would be carried no farther, found ourselves deceived; for the duke could not think of leaving Ghent and Bruges in the possession of the French. To form the siege of the former, the grand army under the command of the Duke of Marlborough, decamped from Bellem on the last of November, and marched in two columns to Marlebeck and Malle, situated on the lower Scheld; on the other hand, Prince Eugene, having five days after passed this river, encamped at Ename, and the town was the next day invested by Count de Lottum, the hereditary prince of Hesse-Cassel, and Count de Tilly. The Duke of Marlborough took up his quarters at Marlebeck, that he might be nearer to three attacks, one of which was on the side of the citadel, another between the imperial gate and that of Brussels, and the third, between the gates of St. Peter and Courtray. While everything was preparing for opening the trenches, which was done on the 13th, and on the 14th, a detachment was sent to attack the Red-house on the canal of Sas van Ghent, where, as it is a place of importance, the French had left a garrison of two hundred men. These forces immediately raised their batteries, and made so furious a fire on the 15th, that the garrison having in vain offered to surrender, on condition they might go off, were compelled to yield themselves prisoners of war. In the mean while the allies pushed on their works before Ghent, had already got as far as the glacis of the counterscarp, and on the 18th, had a number of batteries of bombs and great guns ready, sufficient to reduce the town to a heap of rubbish; but the garrison not thinking it proper to expose the town to such ruin, sent the prince of Isenghien, and two other captains to the Duke of Marlborough, who allowed them to go out with all the marks of honour. Till the capitulation was got ready to sign, hostages were exchanged, and two gates of the town delivered up to us.

As the garrison had flattered themselves with being succoured, it was stipulated in the capitulation, that it should be void, if, in a limited time, the French should draw near with an army and compel us to raise the siege. In effect, when the court of France had intelligence that Ghent was besieged, Marshal Boufflers, with several general officers, set out from Paris for Douay: but having advice by the way, that the town had capitulated, he turned back.

My husband in the siege was one of the forlorn hope, a body of men under the command of a lieutenant, ordered to lay the ropes and to direct the cutting of the trenches: we seldom expect to see any of these return again; but here the danger was greater than customary, as the night was clear, and they were soon descried by the sentinels; but so remarkably expeditious were our men, that they were all covered before the enemy had got their forces together to oppose them. As I always accompanied my husband, however dangerous it was, I, as usual, followed him this time, but Colonel Hamilton stopping me, and saying, Dear Kit, don't be so forward, I lost sight of him, and was some time hunting about before I could find him; for the ropes being lain, he with his companions were retired into a turnip field, and lay flat on their bellies, expecting the trench, which the workmen were throwing up, to cover them. Major Irwin told me where he was; and both the major and Lieutenant Stretton begged hard of me for some beer; but as I had but three flasks, and feared my husband might want, I had no pity for any one else: as the night was very cold, and the ground wet, I had also provided myself with a bottle of brandy, and another of gin, for my dear Richard's refreshment. When I left these officers, I met a lieutenant known by the nick-name of A—— and Pockets; a spent musket-ball had grazed on, and scratched his forehead, which his fright magnified to a cannon-ball. He desired I would show him to a surgeon; but his panic was so great, that I believe, had he been examined at both ends, he stood more in need of having his breeches shifted than his wound dressed. In his fright he left his hat and wig, but they being found and restored him, and he at length assured his wound was no way dangerous, recovered his small share of spirits, but never his reputation; for he was called by every one poltroon, and soon after broke as a coward. Leaving this Cotswold lion, I went to the turnip field, where I found my husband in the front rank, to whom my liquors were very comfortable. We stayed here till the trench was ready for us. The next morning, as I was standing by Colonel Gossedge, he received a shot through the body; I gave him some beer, and a dram, and carried him, though it was very dangerous, to Colonel Folke's quarters, for which piece of service the gentleman was extremely thankful, and promised, if he recovered, to reward me handsomely; but he died in three days. On my leaving him, I was sent for by the Duke of Argyle, to inform him what men we had lost. The next day, a drum of our regiment went into a very dangerous place to ease nature; I cautioned him against it, as

I had observed the enemy pointed at or near that place: he did not heed my advice; but when he was buttoning up his breeches, a cannon-ball took off both his arms. The place where he rashly exposed himself, was so very dangerous, that not a man would venture to go to his assistance. I ran, therefore, and carried him off to a surgeon, under whose care he was in a fair way of doing well, but a cold he got killed him.

At a mile's distance from the town, out of danger, as I thought, of any shot from thence, and near the camp, I pitched my tent, which I stored from a garden belonging to a deserted brewhouse, that I had taken possession of. I had filled my tent with so many potatoes, carrots, turnips, &c., that I left but just room enough to sit down close by the door. One day a drake-shot from the enemy came in there, went through my tent into my garden, where I had turned my mare and an officer's horse, and killed the latter; I was luckily then a foraging, or I had infallibly been killed, as I always sat directly fronting my tent door. This obliged me to remove my tent farther off, that I might be out of danger. While the siege continued, we had, one day, so severe and incessant rain, that not a man in the army had a dry thread on his back, which was followed by so severe a frost in the night, that a fire I had made before my tent, to dry myself and husband, I really believe, saved the lives of a number of our men. I burnt no less than forty faggots that night, which Colonel Godfrey gave me leave to take from a stack in his quarters. Two of our sentinels were found frozen to death.

When the two gates were given up, as I have already said, I got leave to go the day following into the town, where I made fifty shillings of the roots I carried in from the garden; for the garrison having secured to themselves what was in the town, and our men destroyed what was in the country, the scarcity made the burghers ready to give me my own price. The garrison went out of the town on the 22nd of December, fourteen thousand in number, with drums beating, colours flying, carrying with them six pieces of cannon, and were conducted by the way of Gaveren to Tournay. The next day the Duke of Marlborough entered the town, and was complimented at the gate by the magistracy, who presented him the keys in a gold basin. The burghers, who had received the French with open arms, changed sides with their fortune, and made public rejoicings and thanksgivings in the churches for their departure, as a deliverance ardently wished for. These rejoicings were redoubled, on the news which soon after was brought, that the French had abandoned Bruges, and all the neighbouring posts. When the garrison of this town heard that Ghent, which was well fortified, had capitulated, finding themselves summoned by a trumpet in the Duke of Marlborough's name, they prepared for their retreat in earnest, fearing a longer delay might render it impossible: wherefore, on the 22nd of October, at night, they left the town, and withdrew on the side of Dixmude and Nieupoort. At the same time the French abandoned Fort Plassendal, the village of Lessinghen, where they were intrenched, and all the posts they had in those quarters. No sooner had the enemy quitted Bruges, but the magistrates sent deputies to the Duke of Marlborough to make their submission to King Charles. His grace received their submission, and garrisoned the town with two thousand men. Thus ended this glorious campaign; the army was ordered into winter-quarters; our regiment stayed in Ghent, where I got a comfortable living by cooking for, and selling beer to the soldiers. My horse cost me nothing this winter, having procured a sufficient stock of provision and straw at my first entrance into the town.

My husband having, by my interest, obtained leave to go out of town, which no garrison soldier can do under pain of death, without permission, we went out of the gate called the Sas, from the adjacent river of that name, to take a view of the country, and met a poor woman, who wept bitterly; I asked the reason of her tears, and she told me that she had three small children at home, and no way of providing for them, but by running geneva into the town; that the excise officers had lately seized a parcel, which had almost ruined her, and that now being on the point of venturing all she had, her late loss, and the fear she was in of being entirely undone, made her burst into a fit of crying. In the Low Countries no duty is paid for what is not brought into a fortified town, but at the bringing anything within the gates it must pay a duty to the officers stationed there to receive it, and to prevent defrauding the customs. We endeavoured to comfort the poor creature, and told her if she would step into the public house, which was near us, we would do our best to help her in running the geneva into the town. She very thankfully went in with us; she had eleven bladders, each would hold a stoop, ten of them were filled with geneva and the eleventh with nastiness, which the country people keep in pits as the best manure for flax. I then thus divided the bladders; three I gave to my husband, two to the woman, the other five, and that designed for the officers, I took into my custody: three of the geneva bladders were tied round my waist next my skin, two round my neck, so that they fell under each arm, and were covered with my cloak, and the cleanly one I carried in my left hand, and though visibly, I pretended to endeavour to conceal it. I went on in the direct road, but ordered them to go round a little lane, and when they saw the officers busy with me, to make a push for the town. I made for the gate; the officers, to my wish, perceived the bladder, and came up to me; I retreated, and keeping out of their reach, lured them away from, till I saw my comrades pretty near to, the gate; I then suffered them to come up to me, who demanded my geneva, laying hold of the bladder; I soon got it out of his hand who seized it, fell on my knees, and began a lamentable story of my poverty, large family, and sick children, for whose cure I had made a hard shift to purchase it. I amused them with this deplorable story till I saw my comrades within the barrier; but finding they were inexorable, and resolved to plunder me, I took my scissars, which hung by my side, and cutting the bladder, said, Since you must have it, e'en take it, and flung the contents in his face. One of his companions was coming up to seize me, but I showed him another bladder with my scissars, and he retreated, as 'tis probable he had an aversion to perfumes. I had now a free and open passage into the town, which I entered triumphant, with my bladder in my hand. I was no sooner in the town, but my husband and the woman met me; she was glad to see me safe, but when she found her liquors were so too, the poor creature wept for joy; and on relating my adventure, her laughter was as excessive, and had the same effect. This success animated us to a second attempt. The exciseman saw me, and cried out, There's the retailer of soil; I answered, They should find I dealt by wholesale, if ever they offered to disturb me. In short, we often passed with our cargoes, none daring to molest us; till a new officer, who did not know me, was set on by the others: but as I always went with a charge, he repented his temerity, for I gave him so fetid a reception, that I thought he would have brought his heart up. His brethren abused me at a distance, but did not care to come to a close engagement; their language, however, was so provoking, that I threatened for the future to carry a pistol, and blow their brains out, the first time they durst come within my reach. I did indeed arm myself as I had threatened, but I had neither powder nor ball; however, as they had been told my history, I was so terrible to these poltroons, that I believe I might have kept them in awe with a black pudding. Beside the above, I fell upon another stratagem to deceive those harpies the officers of the customs. It was this; I had a large spaniel which I brought up from a puppy; he was of the water breed, and had such a rough coat, that every half year it fetched me three shillings from a hatter. This dog, who had been taught to fetch and carry, we used to go out with, furnished with oily cakes, to the town ditch, where we lay concealed, my husband and the dog on one side, I on the other in the weeds, till the smugglers came with horseloads of brandy, &c., and in small kegs; two or three of these we tied together with a rope, and giving the dog the end in his mouth, he would, on my husband's calling, swim over to him, and he rewarded him with a cake, after which he would return at my call, with the empty rope. This method was repeated till all was got over, which they carried into the town, and we retired till morning, when we entered the gate publicly. The smugglers paid us three crowns a night for our dog and attendance. At this place I was with child, and longed for eels, which one Hugh Jones ventured his life, by going out of town without leave, to get for me, by robbing the wicker baskets in the moat: I mention this because he was afterwards my second husband, and often had attempted my virtue, in the life of my first, who for the tenderness he showed me in this action, bequeathed me to him in case of survivorship. Indeed he took all opportunities to gain my affections, and convince me of his own; and I must acknowledge it was to his assiduity and tenderness, that next to God, I owed the preservation of my life, when I was ill and not able to help myself; in which time he also took care of and supported my mare.

There was at this time a pretty young fellow in garrison with us, a volunteer, but in whose regiment I cannot readily call to mind; he was the younger son of a gentleman of good fortune, who gave him so handsome an allowance, that he maintained a servant and two horses; dressed as well as any officer, and kept the best company; he was very forward in every action; never shunned, but rather courted danger; and, in the midst of the greatest, always showed a great composure of mind in his countenance: he was not above eighteen, but very reserved, and somewhat haughty. This gentleman resented the freedom I took with some officers where he was in company, and told me I was very impertinent. The affront nettled me so much, that I called him a petit maitre, and said, if it would not be a disgrace to me to set my wit to boys, I would teach him better manners, by giving him the correction his ill breeding called for. He answered with a pish only, and turning his back on me, said to a captain, You see the fruits of making mean people familiar: you ought indeed to bear with it, because you have encouraged her taking such liberties, and those brought her impertinence upon you; but 'tis hard upon me, who always have avoided her. You will do well, replied I, to be careful in avoiding me for the future; and went home in a passion, dressed myself in one of my husband's suits (for he had two very handsome ones I had bought him out of my capital, which was not yet quite exhausted), put on my silver-hilted sword, and went to a young woman's house whom the cadet visited. I asked for her, and being introduced, desired to speak with her in private. As soon as she had carried me into a room, and seated herself, desiring me to sit, she asked my business. Madam, said I, to be short with you, I have often seen, and as often admired you; I am now come to tell you the passion you have inspired, which I can no longer conceal; it gives me too great torture. I know you have some engagements with a young English cadet, which have hurt your reputation: but to give you the most convincing proof of my fondness, if you will promise to cast him off, and never see him more, I will not only marry you, but maintain you as the wife of an English gentleman of fortune, as I pretend, and you will find me to be, and promise on my honour, never to reproach you with your former life. Sir, said she, you are very free with my character. Madam, replied I, not more so than the world; for I learned it from common fame. Which, answered my damsel, you will allow a common liar : however, sir, you talk so much like a man of honour, that I can forgive the liberty you have taken, and desire a little time to consider on what you have proposed. I told her, what she might term but a small space, a man as passionately in love as I was, would count an age : I will give you to consider, continued I, till to-morrow ten o'clock, which is not less, by my computation, than a month's delay ; and rising up, saluted her, and took my leave. I was punctual to my hour the next morning, and she told me, she accepted my conditions, and as a proof that she would be just to them, said, I last night refused to see the cadet, notwithstanding he was very urgent. I stayed with her three hours, in which time I had promised her mountains ; a life which should be but one continued round of pleasure, and an affection which no time should have force to alter. During my visit I had the satisfaction to hear her servant tell the cadet, who came to see his mistress, that she was not at home, and that she had left word, in case he came to the house, in her absense, that she should take it as a favour, his giving over visiting her, which would beside save him a fruitless trouble. He said, I suppose she has some new favourite, I shall find him out ; and flung away in a rage, which gave me the most sensible pleasure. I took my leave soon after, and was going home to shift my dress, when I spied my cadet at a little distance, who watched his mistress's door. He hastened after me, and asked what business I had in that house, which he saw me come out of. Sir, said I, By what authority do you ask me ? Here, said he, is my commission to examine you, laying his hand on his sword ; and I, doing the like, replied, Here is my reason for not answering you. We both drew, the moment my husband passed by, who, knowing me, also drew, and got between us, saying, My dear Kitty, what's the meaning of this ? At these words, the cadet, looking earnestly in my face, knew me, put up his sword, laughed heartily, and taking me by the hand, said, Let us be friends for the future ; I am glad I have not a more dangerous rival ; come Kit, I'll give you and your husband a bottle and bird for dinner. You see, said I, what it is to affront me ; for I have made but two visits to your mistress, and in them have made such a progress, that you have been twice refused entrance. An officer of our acquaintance coming by, he prevailed on him to keep us company. The cadet carried us to the Couronne Imperiale, where he ordered a handsome dinner; after which we drank a hearty bottle, were very merry with the manner of my revenge; he begged pardon for having affronted me, promised he would be no more guilty, and entreated me to undeceive his mistress, whom he could easily forgive agreeing to honourable and such alluring conditions as I had offered. I reconciled them, and we were all good friends the little time he stayed in the Low Countries, which was but ten days after; for his elder brother dying by a hurt he received by a fall in hunting, his father sent for him over, and he carried his lady with him to England.

I have already said that a very great frost immediately followed the taking of Ghent, and that two of our sentinels were found frozen to death. This frost continued, and was so terribly severe, that a number of people, fruit trees, and sown seed, perished by the cold. This hard winter occasioned a very great scarcity, and excessively raised the price of all manner of provisions, especially in France, where almost all the vines were frost-nipped to the very roots: so that of many years before, that kingdom had not been in so deplorable a situation. The treasury was exhausted by the expense of the war; trade was interrupted by the number of ships the two maritime powers kept constantly cruising in all parts of the seas to prevent the importation of goods; the farmer was not only incapable of paying his rent, but even of supplying the towns with necessary provisions; in a word, they were in the utmost desolation. To the cries of the miserable harassed people were joined public acts of devotion to appease the anger of heaven, to deprecate their then present miseries, and to obtain a speedy peace, which they looked upon as the only remedy to these oppressive evils. The king gave his people to understand that he was sensibly touched with their sufferings, and declared that he was inclined to give them peace, whatever it cost him. In effect, he sent Messieurs Voisin and Rouille, to Holland, in appearance upon the affair of the fishery; but in earnest, to set on foot a negotiation with the allies. The secret was so closely kept all the time the conferences were held at the Hague, that no one had any certain knowledge of what was upon the carpet; but the number of extraordinary couriers, which were observed to pass and repass, gave some inkling of a treaty of peace, and hopes of a happy issue; more especially when they saw the Duke of Marlborough, who had been at all the conferences, go for England on the 2nd of May, and return again on the 15th, N.S., accompanied by Lord Townshend, whom the queen had honoured with the character of envoy extraordinary, to treat on a peace. The French King sent Messieurs Torcy and Pajot, to hasten its conclusion. Notwithstanding the protest made by King Philip, that he would never renounce the crown of Spain, but was resolved, on the contrary, to maintain his right to it by the sword to the last drop of his blood, the conferences were carried on more briskly than ever, and sometimes protracted to midnight. On the 28th of May, N. S., articles were prepared and signed by the plenipotentiaries of the allies. Beside a great number of towns in the Low Countries, on the Rhine and elsewhere, which France gave up by these articles, Charles was declared in them lawful king of all the Spanish monarchy; and it was agreed that Philip and his family should quit that kingdom by the 1st of September, and in case of his refusal, that the King of France should join his arms to those of the allies, to compel him by force.

Messieurs Torcy and Pajot set out for the court of France with the preliminaries agreed upon; but at the time that every one thought the peace in a manner concluded, advice came that Lewis XIV. could never consent to assist in dethroning his grandson, and for that reason had rejected the articles: thus vanished all the hopes conceived of the pacification of Europe.

The negotiations of peace had not suspended the necessary preparations for continuing the war; upon their being broken off, Mr. Rouille set out on his return to France on the 9th of June, N. S., and the Duke of Marlborough on the same day for the army.

The French being intrenched near Arras, in a camp covered with woods and marshes, which rendered it impracticable to approach them, the duke turned back upon Tournay, a very strong town, where Monsieur de Surville commanded a garrison of four thousand men. We invested the place on the 27th of June, N. S., and while preparations were making to open the trenches, the Prince of Orange, stadtholder of Frise, at the head of thirty squadrons and twelve battalions, appeared before, and made himself master of St. Amand, and at the same time another detachment took Fort de la Scarpe sword in hand. In the interim, the line of circumvallation was finished, and several thousand fascines, gabions, palisades, and other materials necessary for the works, were got together, and the trench was opened on the 7th of July, N.S., before the castle, by four battalions and two thousand workmen under the command of Count Lottum; before the hornwork of the seven fountains, by three battalions and two thousand workmen, commanded by General Schulemburg; and by General Fagel, at the head of the like number of soldiers and pioneers near the gate of Marville. Notwithstanding the dilligence of the besiegers, the siege was likely to prove a very tedious one, because the boats on which the artillery was embarked could not get up the Scheld higher than Oudenard on account of the shallowness of the water, and the banks raised by the French the preceding year to turn its course, several of which were yet standing. However, this obstacle was obviated by cutting a new canal; and the artillery being at length arrived, we began on the 13th to batter the outworks. Assisted by the fire of our batteries, General Fagel pushed on his works to the very brink of the ditch, which on the 17th he began to fill up. Count Lottum was on the same day pretty near as far advanced with his; and the night before, Baron de Schulemburg having carried the hornworks sword in hand, made a lodgment there, and moreover possessed himself of a neighbouring ravelin. Monsieur de Surville finding himself thus straitened, on the 28th, between seven and eight in the evening, hung out the white flag at the three attacks. The capitulation was signed the next morning, and the garrison withdrew into the citadel, all the works of which were mined.

At the expiration of the truce agreed upon, to give the garrison time to retire into the citadel, Count Lottum and the Baron de Schulemburg attacked it in two different places, and a re-enforcement of thirty battalions and six squadrons were sent them from the grand army. Four days after the opening the trench, Monsieur de Ravignan, sent by the French king, arrived in the camp of the besiegers, and having obtained leave to speak to one of the officers of the citadel, the governor sent the next day a project of agreement to the allies, by which he engaged to surrender on the 5th of September, if he was not before succoured; all hostilities were to cease during that interval, between the besiegers and besieged, and a gate of the citadel was to be given up to the former on the 8th of August, if the King of France approved the agreement; for whose approbation Monsieur de Ravignan returned to the court; but nothing was concluded upon, because the king insisted on extending the truce to the two armies; wherefore the fire was again begun, and surely never was so much fire seen from beneath the earth. As the citadel was everywhere mined round, notwithstanding all the industry and fatigue of the allies to discover them, they played off no less than thirty-eight, at only Count Lottum's attack, in twenty-six days' time; so that we often saw hundreds of men at once fly into the air, and fall down again piecemeal, or buried alive; and if any were dug out living, they were miserably shattered in their limbs, or half roasted. Very often the miners on either side, met and fought with as much fury under ground, as they did in the trenches: however, the place was so violently attacked, that the governor hung out the white ensign on the 31st of August, N.S., but as the besiegers would allow him no other terms than his surrendering prisoner of war, he broke off the parley, and threatened he would blow all up before he would surrender on such terms. On this the siege was once more begun, and the governor given to understand, that if he persisted in his design he must expect no quarter. This threat made him change his desperate resolution, and he accepted the conditions offered him; but with a promise that the garrison should be exchanged as soon as possible, for a like number of prisoners taken by the French.

My husband's regiment was one of those that attacked the citadel. One day Lord Cobham coming into the trench, ordered the engineer to point a gun at a windmill between us and the citadel, and promised a guinea to whoever fired and brought it down; I immediately snatched the match out of the man's hand who was going to fire, clapped it to the touchhole, and down came the windmill. Major Petit, before I fired, bid me take care the cannon did not recoil upon me, or break the drums of my ears, which I had forgot to stop. I was in too much haste to get the guinea, and not minding the caution, I was beat backwards, and had the noise of the cannon a long while after in my ears. The officers could not refrain laughing to see me set on my backside; but as I was not hurt, I had, according to the proverb, Let him laugh that wins, the most reason to be merry about the mouth, for Lord Cobham, always better than his word, gave me two guineas, saying I was a bold wench, instead of one he promised me; General Fagel gave me another, and four officers gave me a ducat a-piece.

Soon after, Captain Brown mounting the trench, had his leg so miserably shattered by a musket-shot, that the surgeon was obliged to cut it off. His servants and nurses not having the courage to hold the candle, I performed that office, and was very intent on the operation, which no way shocked me, as it was absolutely necessary.

During this siege, or indeed any other, I never lost an opportunity of marauding; to this end I was furnished with a grappling iron and a sword, for I must acquaint my reader, that, on the approach of an army, the boors throw their plate, copper, &c., into wells; their linen they bury in chests, and for their own security they get into fortified towns, or under the shelter of some strong place. With my grapple I searched all the wells I met with, and got good booty, sometimes kitchen utensils, brass pails, pewter dishes, &c.; sometimes a silver spoon. With my sword, which I carried to discover what was buried, I bored the ground, where I found it had been lately stirred. This I learned of the Dutch soldiers in Ireland when King William was there; for they discovered by this method, and took away a chest of linen my mother had hid under ground, with a large quantity of wheat. While I was one day busied in search of plunder, I heard behind me a great burst, like a sudden short clap of thunder, and turning nimbly round, I saw the air full of shattered limbs of men. This happened, as I was informed at my return, by a spark from a pipe of tobacco setting fire to a bomb, by which fifty shells and twenty-four of our men were blown up; but luckily, our magazine of powder, though near the same place, escaped. As I have often said, wherever my husband was ordered upon duty, I always followed him, and he was sometimes of the party that went to search for and draw the enemy's mines; I was often engaged with their party under ground, where our engagements were more terrible than in the field, being sometimes near suffocated with the smoke of straw which the French fired to drive us out ; and the fighting with pickaxes and spades, in my opinion, was more dangerous than with swords. I have, in the journal of the siege, taken notice of the number of mines sprung ; one of which blew up four hundred of our men, and another narrowly missed carrying up a whole regiment, which was just drawn off as it was fired, so that the designed execution was by accident prevented, and only eight men lost.

After having hastily filled up the works before Tournay, the Prince of Hesse-Cassel began his march at the head of sixteen thousand men, to invest Mons, the capital of Hainault, and to take possession of some posts in its neighbourhood, especially along the river Trouille, which runs by that town. On the 4th of September he was followed by the rest of the army, but the rains and the straitness of the ways was such an hindrance to our march, that the French had time enough, having also decamped, to march to Blangies, and post their horse in a plain between two woods, in which they had placed their infantry. The allies, at their arrival, found the enemy thus posted, and resolved to attack and drive them from their camp : but as they would undertake nothing, without the assent of the deputies of the States, who were not yet come up, the French took the advantage of that time to make their camp inaccessible, by covering it with a triple intrenchment. Notwithstanding this new obstacle, the allies prepared for a battle, early in the morning, on the 11th, N.S. ; and with all imaginable resolution, at eight o'clock, marched up to the intrenchments. Our left wing, commanded by the duke, charged with such bravery, that we drove the French out of the two first intrenchments, cutting all to pieces that opposed us ; but could not force the third, which was defended by a great many pieces of cannon, and felled trees laid athwart : however, we sometime maintained the ground we had got upon the enemy, though exposed to the fire of their artillery, which swept down whole companies at a time ; but at length, seeing our number terribly diminished, we were obliged to abandon the two intrenchments we had carried. In the mean while the foot of the right, commanded by Prince Eugene, having made through the wood into the plains after a most obstinate resistance of the French, gave the horse an opportunity also to force the intrenchment joining to the wood. The horse on both sides were engaged with an unparalleled fury: but the allies continually getting ground, as their troops entered the intrenchments, the advantage was visibly on their side: they put to flight the main battle, and by that gave an opportunity to their left wing, which had returned to the attack, to recover the two intrenchments, which they could not before keep, and also to carry the third: this was followed by an entire defeat of the French army; which, at three in the afternoon, took to flight, and in its turn, by the confusion they fled in, lost a great number of men, so that the slaughter on both sides was really terrible; for as far as I could see, the ground was covered with dead and dying men. The allies lost fourteen thousand men killed, wounded, or prisoners: the French nineteen thousand.

The night before the battle of Taisnieres, Lieutenant-General Dedem went off with a detachment to throw himself into St. Guilain, which the Duke of Malborough was assured, the French garrison had abandoned; but the general, in his march, receiving certain advice to the contrary, instead of two hundred foot, which he designed to send thither from Genap, drew from thence five hundred, and sustained them with two squadrons. Colonel Haxhuisen, who commanded this detachment, sent a drum to summon the garrison, having, as he drew near the town, extended his front, that he might make a greater show of number: on a refusal to surrender, he gave the assault that very day; and after a quarter of an hour's dispute he carried a barricade, and advanced behind a house on the right of the battery; on which the chamade was beat; but as they had not done it soon enough, they were forced to surrender prisoners of war.

Our army now invested Mons, into which the French found means, eight days after the battle, to introduce a convoy of ammunitions, provisions, money, and a thousand men; the trenches were opened on the 25th over against Fort Berteauumont, by the engineer General Hartel, with four battalions, and two thousand workmen; and before the gate of Havre by two battalions, and also two thousand workmen; under the command of the engineer De Bauffe. We were terribly hindered by the rains, which obliged us to bottom the trenches with fascines, and to drain them by cutting a long gut, which reached as far as the Trouille: but notwithstanding all obstacles, we pushed on our approaches so briskly, that having finished our batteries, we were ready to give the assault to the hornwork near Berteauumont gate, on the 20th of October: the garrison, however, prevented us, by beating the chamade. Deputies came out of the town, and returned again by eight o'clock with the articles of capitulation, which they brought back the next morning with the governor's approbation. At eleven o'clock we were put into possession of Nimy Gate; two days after the garrison marched out; the French were conducted to Maubeuge, the Spaniards and Bavarians to Namur. The reduction of this town terminated the campaign in Flanders.

When we left Tournay, and before the investing of Mons, as the army marched towards the French lines, I chose to go with the camp color-men, who, attended by the forlorn hope, march at so considerable a distance before the army, that they are often cut off before any force can come up to their assistance; which, though it makes it the most dangerous post, it is the most profitable, if there is any plunder to be got, as there are but few to share it. In our march I espied at some distance a great house, which I, advancing before the camp color-men, ran to, leaving my horse to the care of a sick sergeant, who was glad of the opportunity to ride. I here found six couple of fowls with their legs tied, a basket of pigeons, and four sheep, which were also tied and ready to be carried off; but I suppose, upon our appearance, the people made the best of their way to secure things of greater value. One of the sheep I killed, dressed, cut off a leg, and all the fat. The other three I loosed, and turned into the yard; by the time I had done, our men, came up with me, and I put the carcass of the sheep on my mare, before the sergeant; the fowls I hung about my neck; drove my sheep before me, and so marched to the place designed for the camp, called Havre. Being here arrived, while they were fixing boughs for the disposition of the camp, and marking out ground for every regiment, I pitched my tent near a deserted public house, allotted for Colonel Hamilton's quarters: turned my sheep to grass, and hung up my mutton on a tree to cool: I then went into the colonel's quarters, over which, as soon as it was appointed, a guard was set; but by a bribe, I struck him so blind, that he could not see me and my husband's comrades, who lent a friendly hand, carry off a large quantity of faggots, hay and straw for my mare, and my own bed; fill all my empty flasks with beer, and roll off a whole barrel to my tent. Having made these prizes, I cut up my mutton, laid by a shoulder to roast, the neck and breast to make broth; dug a hole with a hatchet to boil my pot in, which, the fire being made, I set on with the mutton and sweet herbs, and was enjoying myself by a glorious fire, when the army came up. Colonel Hamilton and Major Erwood came to my fire, and were not a little surprised to see I had gotten so many things in readiness. I showed them my provisions of all sorts; upon which the colonel, suspecting that I had plundered his quarters, asked where I had got my barrel of strong beer. I told him, that falling in with some boors, I drove them before me, and made them bring me what I wanted; to which he civilly replied, D—n you, you are a lying devil. Come, said I, you mutton-monger, will you give me a handsel? They called for a gallon of beer, and drinking a little, gave the rest among some of the men, and ordered the shoulder of mutton to be roasted, which I did by pitching two forked sticks into the ground, putting it on a jointed spit, and setting a soldier's wife to turn it. I made four crowns a-piece of my sheep, besides the fat, which I sold to a woman who made mould candles for the men, and made a good penny of my fowls and pigeons. A body of troopers and some hussars, being ordered out to reconnoitre in the woods at Taisnieres, before the enemy intrenched themselves, and to cover the foragers, with strict charge to return at the firing of a cannon, I being one of the foragers, took my mare along with me, leaving another horse which I had bought of a hussar in an orchard near Brigadier Lalo's quarters, and digging a hole, I buried my money. When we were some distance from the camp, I pushed forward, on which Quarter-master Hankey and Lieutenant Mackenny bid me not be too venturesome; I answered, that I saw no danger, and hastened on to a large house, which I entered, and found a bed ready made, two or three tubs of flour; an oven full of hot bread, a considerable quantity of bacon and beef hanging in the chimney, a basket full of cocks and hens, with two pots of butter. I emptied the feathers out of the tick to cover my mare with, lest the hot bread should burn her back, then threw the feathers out of the bolster, into one end of which I put my bread, and into the other my beef and bacon; my pots of butter I slung on each side of her, took my fowls in my hand, and mounted; which I had scarcely done when I heard the signal gun, an alarm given the foragers, that the whole body of the enemy was coming upon us; and that their seeming to march to the left, was only to cover the filing off their infantry into the woods. The terror with which the foragers were struck at the news is hardly credible; the fields were strewed with corn, hay, and utensils, which they had not the courage to take along with them; nay, some, whose horses were at a little distance, rather chose to lose, than venture to fetch them: I jogged on towards the army, but seeing a fine truss of hay lying, and fearing my horses might want, the danger could not make me withstand the temptation; I leaped off my mare, clapped it upon her, and mounting again got safe to the place where the army lay. I was surprised to see all in motion: however, I stayed to kill my fowls, fetch my horse, and money that I had buried, strike my tent, with which, and other things, I loaded him, and followed the army. My husband being in the rear, I had an opportunity of conversing with him; he was extremely melancholy, and told me this engagement would most certainly be the last he should ever see: I endeavoured to laugh him out of this notion, but he insisted upon it that he should be killed, which proved but too true. In our march, so heavy a rain fell, that we were ankle deep, and seeing a little child of one of my husband's comrades, I took it up lest it should be lost in the deep clay. At night, when in sight of the enemy, our army halted, and lay that night on some fallow ground, on which were many heaps of dung, and he was a happy man who could get one to sleep upon. I left the army, and went to a great house in the rear to dress my provisions; I led my horses into the house, which by the help of one Armstrong, a butcher, and of Lord Orkney's French baker, I unloaded. Next I made a great wood fire, with what I found, dried myself and the child, and laid it on some straw before the fire. I had now leisure to look out for forage for my beasts, and found some flax, hay, and clover: with the first I littered them, threw the other before them, and locking them up in a handsome parlour, thought of dressing some victuals; in order to which I went to the well for water, and found a bucket, which is not common, for the boors, as they had several things in the wells, commonly cut them away. In letting down my bucket I thought it struck against something which sounded like a brass kettle; I was not out; for, letting down my drag, I brought one up; and at the next throw I fetched out a brass pail, in which was a silver quart mug in a fish-skin case. I made several other casts, but brought up nothing more: wherefore, leaving the well, having taken what water I wanted, I set it on the fire, pulled my fowls, which, with some of my hung beef and bacon, I clapped into the pot, and then stepped into the garden to cut some sprouts, washed and put them in, and leaving the care of the cooking to Armstrong and the baker, strolled over the house for plunder; but after searching several rooms, I found nothing worth carrying off, but what was too cumbersome; wherefore I visited the cellar, where I found, to my great joy, a barrel of excellent strong beer. I immediately ran up for, and filled my pails; as I was returning with these full, I happened to stumble against an inward cellar-door, which flying open, discovered another small one: I hastened up with my beer, full of hopes of finding somewhat better worth within the little door. I found two rundlets and two quart bottles of vinegar, and two more of very good brandy, with which I filled my flasks, and placed all my booty in the parlour, where my beasts were shut up. My provisions being ready, I clapped them and a quantity of beer on one of my mares, having first regaled my two assistants, who were not a little thankful, for provision was then so scarce in the army, a guinea and half was offered for an ounce of bread, and there was no probability of getting any supply till the battle was over, which we expected would be, and, as I have, already shown, was, very bloody. I filled the child's belly, filled her apron with victuals, and taking her with me, left her with her father, whom I soon found, and who was very ill of an ague, lying in a miserable condition on a heap of dung. He would fain have had me take care of her, but I could not undertake the charge. Leaving her, I went in search of my husband; and after a considerable time, as there was so great a fog I could scarce see a yard before me, I met with one of our regiment, who cried out, Here comes the picture of plenty. I asked for my husband, and he showed him fast asleep, with his head on his comrade's backside. I awakened him, and bid him ask what officers or soldiers he thought fit to eat with him, especially such as he was obliged to; for I had brought a large quantity of provisions. I set the bread, butter, and beef, before his comrades, who, sitting down on the dung, made a hearty meal, though they had no tablecloth, knives, &c.; reserving the bacon, fowls and sprouts, for my husband and the invited officers, who were Colonel and Captain Hamilton, Colonel Irwin, Captain Ross, Major Maclane, and Colonel Folks. Two fowls, some bacon and beef, I gave to my husband and his sergeant; when every one of these were satisfied, I gave the remainder of my provisions to some young recruits, who, not being inured to hardships, were ready to perish with hunger. I had set apart some pullets with eggs for the general officers, and sought out my Lord Orkney, whom I found with the Generals, Lumley, Webb, Withers, and Lord North and Grey. As soon as Lord Orkney saw me, he asked if I had any beer to give him. I answered, I had enough, at his lordship's service, but I thought he had better eat before he drank. That's true, said my lord, if I knew where to get it, but I don't believe there is anything in the army. You guess pretty near the truth, I replied, for I don't believe any one has a morsel except myself, and if you could take up with fowl, bacon, sprouts, and hung beef, I have them ready at your service: and set them before him. This was a very agreeable surprise to them all; they tore the meat with their fingers, and eat very heartily; but wanting water to mix with their wine, on some soldier's refusal, I went to the well within musket-shot of the enemy, and fetched them some. I remember one of the company proposed a motion of the army, not only without the Duke of Marlborough's order, but contrary to his express command, which was to keep ourselves in readiness to march on the word given. Lord Orkney said, they ought to wait till his grace's orders came, for he durst say he knew better than any in the company when to give them, and thought it was their duty to wait. On this, another, whose name I purposely conceal, said, that his grace was gone into the wood in close conference with his nephew, the Duke of Berwick, and wished it was not to sell the army of the allies: Lord Orkney, with some warmth, answered, that it was ungenerous as unjust to harbour a thought so injurious to the duke's honour, and so contrary to his nature; that he would be bound body for body, that he was incapable of anything which could cast a blemish on his exalted character, than which no man breathing could, with justice, boast a greater, nay, he knew none that could equal him. The Duke of Argyle joined the company, and soon after, went open-breasted among the men to encourage them to behave as became Englishmen; you see, brothers, said he, I have no concealed armour, I am equally exposed with you, and I require none to go where I shall refuse to venture: remember you fight for the liberties of all Europe, and the glory of your nation, which shall never suffer by my behaviour; and I hope the character of a Briton is as dear to every one of you. To do him justice, he always fought where the danger was greatest, and encouraged the soldiers more by his actions than by his words. The Duke of Marlborough had indeed a conference with the Duke of Berwick, which gave him an opportunity to view the enemy's batteries, which was of signal service to us. At his return, he gave orders for the cutting fascines, which were to fill up a morass between us and the French; after which, a battery was raised, and our guns playing upon the French battery soon dismounted the cannon which the duke had noted, and was covered by the wood, by which the intrenchment was more accessible. I have already given an account of this battle, wherefore I shall only observe, that the English guards first entered the wood, and, though they behaved gallantly, were repulsed with prodigious loss; our regiment seconded their attack, and was as roughly handled.

I entered the wood with small beer for my husband; though the shot and bark of trees flew thicker than my reader, if he has not seen action, can well imagine; not a few pieces of the latter fell on my neck, and gave me no small uneasiness by getting down my stays. My dog, which I have before mentioned, at the entrance of the wood, howled in a pitiful manner, which surprised me, as it was unusual. A man near me, who was easing nature, said, Poor creature, he would fain tell you that his master is dead. How, said I, is he dead? I know not, replied he, if he is dead or not, but I am sure he is very much wounded. This brought into my mind his foreboding that he should be killed in this battle. I was almost out of my wits; but though I feared the worst, my hopes of finding him alive supported me. I ran among the dead, and turned over near two hundred, among whom I found Brigadier Lalo, Sir Thomas Pendergrass, and a great number more of my best friends, before I found my husband's body, which a man, who was a stranger to me, though I was not unknown to him, was stripping. At my approach he went off, and left his booty, fearing the effects of the rage I was in at the sight of my dead husband; and I certainly had killed him, could I have laid my hands on him; for I was in so great a fury, that I bit out a great piece out of my right arm, tore my hair, threw myself on his corpse, and should have put a period to my life had I had any instrument of death. Here I lay some time before my tears flowed, which at length gushed forth in such abundance, that I believe the stream saved my life, at least my senses. While I was deploring my loss, Captain Ross came by, who, seeing my agony, could not forbear sympathising with me, and dropped some tears, protesting that the poor woman's grief touched him nearer than the loss of so many brave men. This compassion from the captain gave me the nickname of Mother Ross; by which I became better known than by that of my husband. After my tears had a little relieved me, I took my husband's body, laid it across my mare, which I led into the ground, dug a grave, buried him, and would have thrown myself into the same pit, had not some of his comrades, who were at hand, prevented me. Seeing I was prevented, I mounted my mare, though almost naked, for I had in my distraction torn off great part of my clothes, and pushed into the wood, notwithstanding I had no arms, to wreak my vengeance on the French, of whom our army was then in pursuit, resolving to tear in pieces whoever fell into my hands; nay, had I had strength and opportunity, I would have given no quarter to any man in the French army. I was running full speed after them, and was near Mambeuge when Captain Usher laid hold of my mare and forced me back, or I had infallibly been either killed or taken. The former I did not think a misfortune; but mine did not end with my pursuit, for my distraction rendered me incapable of looking after my business, giving myself up to my grief and tears, which employed my whole time for seven days, in transports running to my husband's grave and endeavouring to remove the earth with my hands, that I might have another view of the dear man, whom I loved with greater tenderness than I did myself, and for whose safety I would not have hesitated at sacrificing my own life. I always found my poor dog lying on his master's grave; but at my drawing near, he ran to the rear of the regiment, where my poor husband used to be while living. The poor creature's gratitude was so great, that for eight days I could not get him to eat anything: our removal from the place, and time, mitigated his visible grief. I myself, though often importuned, touched nothing of sustenance for a whole week. The Prince of Orange, near whose quarters my tent was pitched, and who heard my cries, was so charitable as to order his servants to fetch me to meals, saying, The poor woman weeps night and day, and will, I fear, kill herself, which would grieve me. They obeyed his highness's compassionate orders, and would set the choicest meats before me, but I could touch nothing; I only enjoyed the comfort of the fire, and the liberty of taking coals to make me one in my tent. The first who prevailed on me to touch meat, was a Scotch Cameronian, who forced me to a tent where he had got a breast of mutton; but I was so weak that I could not support the smell of the meat, but fainted away with the first bit between my teeth; lay a long time as dead, and was brought to my senses by very slow degrees; which Colonel Hamilton's lady hearing, she sent for me, and ordered what was more suitable to my condition. After I had eat a little, she endeavoured to divert my melancholy, and frequently would have me to dinner with her, at which time she would chide me in a gay manner for grieving for one man so much, when the battalion afforded a number, out of which I might pick and choose; sometimes, again, she would very gravely represent to me the sin of self-murder, which would be the consequence of indulging to my grief. That it was, beside, disputing the will of God, which we ought to obey with resignation, and not presumptuously to call his will in question. Colonel Hamilton often seconded his lady's charity, and in about six weeks I began to get the better of my grief, though it was long before I could entirely shake it off. In this time my affairs went backward; I had neglected everything, and left my tent to the care of a drummer and his wife, who were so good as to consume my whole substance by sinking the produce of my effects, and their generosity to such as came to sponge under the pretence of visits of condolence. My mares fared better than I did; for one Hugh Jones, a grenadier, whom I have before mentioned, took them under his care, and provided them every night with forage, which he got from Captain Hume's stables. He had often solicited me in my husband's time, but finding me entirely averse to even the thoughts of injuring my husband, he gave over his suit, and esteemed me for my honesty. My husband being dead, this esteem was changed to love; he now renewed his suit, and courted me for a wife. His care of my mares, his having ventured his life to save my longing when I was with child at Ghent, and his daily endeavouring to oblige me, together with his threats of putting an end to his life if I continued obstinate, prevailed on me to marry him in the camp, about eleven weeks after my husband's decease, on condition that he should not eat or bed with me till we were in garrison, which he agreed to, and kept his promise, however contrary to his inclinations. My marriage being known, had like to have caused a duel between a sergeant and my new husband, the former saying, The cow that lows most after her calf went soonest to bull; the latter took him up in a very sharp manner, and if others had not interposed, and made them friends, after the sergeant had acknowledged that he was in the wrong to reflect upon me, he might have repented his being witty.

After the reduction of Mons, our regiment was garrisoned at Ghent, where we spent the winter without any event worthy of notice; wherefore I shall pass over this winter season, and go on to the operations of the ensuing campaign, after I have taken a short view of affairs in Spain; as this year was fought the battle of Almenara, where we quitted scores with the Spaniards for the loss we sustained in that of Almanza. The Emperor sent his brother King Charles some troops from Italy, which arrived very opportunely to check the progress of the enemy, who had carried the town and castle of Alicant; defeated the Portuguese in the plain of Guadiana, and lived at discretion in their country. Philip himself took the field, and directed his march to Catalonia; but having intelligence that the French were ordered to run no hazard, he returned to Madrid very much dissatisfied, and there found a general consternation on the intelligence they had of the King of France having recalled his troops. Resolving to make the next campaign in person, he caused very great levies to be made, set out on the 3rd of May, N.S., arrived the 10th, at Lerida, where he held a council of war, in which it was resolved to besiege Balaguera; but the waters being out, and having advice of the re-enforcement his competitor had received from Italy, after he had invested the town, he judged it proper to draw off from before it, and return to Lerida. King Charles being informed of this march, privately raised his camp, and marched with such expedition, that having passed the Neguera, with the greater part of the army, at noon, on the 27th of July, he marched to meet the enemy, who immediately drew up on the rising ground of Almenara with forty squadrons, which were all their horse, and eight or ten battalions, while the rest of their foot advanced. On another rising ground, which commanded that where the enemy was posted, the allies mounted fourteen pieces of cannon; and without staying for the right wing, charged the Spaniards so briskly with sixteen squadrons, that they broke and drove them upon their foot that were in the bottom, whom they trod down, and caused so great a confusion, that throwing away their arms, and leaving their baggage, tents, and a number of cannon and waggons, they fled by the favour of the night, which was coming on, to Lerida. King Philip arrived there at midnight, very much displeased with the behaviour of his horse. On his arrival, he was blooded, having been thrown by his horse, frightened with a cannon-ball, in the engagement.

After this victory, which cost the allies but four hundred men, they took in Balbastro, Estadilla, Sarizena, Guesqua, Abastello, and Moncon; all the garrisons of which places were made prisoners of war: and a great part of the kingdom of Aragon, as far as Huesca, submitted to King Charles, who, decamping from Moncon on the 12th of August, endeavoured to bring the enemy to a second battle. He passed the Ebro near Oзера, on the 19th, and marched directly to them; who, commanded by the Marquis de Bay, were posted on the rising ground of Jariexo, stretching the left towards Saragossa; he had the Ebro behind him, and the little river Huebra covered his front; each army preparing on the 19th of August, at night, for a general engagement the next day. The Spanish cannon began to play on the very dawn, and made a terrible fire on the allies, who, notwithstanding, marched up in order of battle, as well as the ground would allow, and receiving with surprising intrepidity the enemy's fire, began the attack at eleven o'clock. The generals, Amezaga and Mahoni, repulsed the left wing of the allies, and pursued them as far as Alagon and the Ebro, which advantage gave the Spaniards great hopes of the victory: but General Staremberg, charging, in his turn, the left wing of the enemy, and taking them at the same time in flank with a part of his foot posted behind hedges, they threw themselves in disorder on the main body, which they put into confusion and caused an entire defeat of their whole army, about four in the afternoon. King Charles, who had the satisfaction of supping that night in the tent of his competitor, took sixty-two colours and standards, twenty-two pieces of cannon, all the equipages, six thousand private men, and four hundred officers. General Mahoni, who, with some of the runaways had thrown himself into the castle of Alfaxerea, near Saragossa, was summoned, and having no hopes of succour, obliged to surrender prisoner of war with those who had followed him.

After this defeat, Philip, with an escort of two hundred officers, took the road of Madrid, where he arrived on the 24th. He immediately ordered money and provisions to be sent to his scattered troops, and drew five thousand men from the frontiers of Andalusia, to re-enforce his army, which was drawing together. In the interim, Saragossa, capital of Aragon, submitted to King Charles, and sent him a present of seventy thousand pieces of eight, with a quantity of clothing, ammunition, and provision for his army. After this the allies marched to Madrid: on their approach, Philip, not thinking himself secure, sent the rich furniture of the palace to Valladolid, which he the next day followed, with the Queen, the Prince of Asturia, and all the privy-council and grandees of the court. He passed by the way of Montejo de la Vega, the ancient seat of the kings of Castile, and arrived the 16th at Valladolid, having promised the Castilians, by a letter, to return to Madrid in the space of a month. This promise, however, did not prevent the town's submitting to King Charles: General Stanhope having summoned it on the 21st, four deputies were sent to Alcala de Henares; after which a general amnesty was proclaimed, and public rejoicings continued for three days. The allies having taken out of the church of our Lady d'Atocha, the colours they had formerly lost, encamped at Canillejas; and King Charles took his quarters in the stately seat of Count Aguilar, a league distant from Madrid. On the 28th, he made his entry into that metropolis, preceded by Count Galves's regiment, and followed by his guards, he marched through the streets of Alcala and Callemajor, to the gate of Guadalaxara, and from thence through the great square to our Lady d'Atocha, where he heard mass. He left the town the same night, without taking a view of the royal palace.

The promise Philip had made the Castilians to return to Madrid in a month, he made good; for the troops he had drawn together from all quarters, formed so considerable an army, that the allies were obliged to quit that town on the 11th of November, and to withdraw to Toledo, which had submitted to King Charles. Philip, who returned to Madrid the 3rd of December, with Duke Vendome and the privy-counsellors, &c., who followed him, set out three days after, to place himself at the head of his forces. His design was to follow the allies in their retreat to Aragon, and bring them to a battle, in which, in all likelihood, he would have had the advantage, they being divided into several corps, that they might more easily subsist. On advice that General Stanhope was at Brihuega, with eight battalions, and as many squadrons, he ordered it to be immediately invested. The cannon having opened a breach, the troops made the assault, and pushed to the very centre of the town, and, after a defence of twenty-eight hours, compelled this numerous corps to surrender prisoners of war; but on this condition, however, that the officers should not be spoiled of their equipages and horses. General Staremberg hearing the danger that Stanhope was in, marched with all the army to his succour, and in the night fired several cannon to give him notice of his arrival. On the 10th, he advanced as far as the plain of Villa Viciosa, whither the Spanish army, after the expedition of Brihuega, marched in order of battle to meet him, they being greatly superior in number. The Duke of Vendome with the right wing, attacked the left of the allies, which he overthrew in an instant; then taking their horse in flank, routed them, and drove the foot, who maintained the fight till night, when they fled towards Seguenca, leaving behind them their cannon and wounded men, with a great number of waggons. The Germans give a quite different account, and say that the main body and right wing, consisting of thirty squadrons and sixteen battalions, were five different times attacked, and not only at length entirely defeated the enemy's horse, but drove the whole army of the Spaniards beyond the Tajune; killed six thousand, and remained masters of the field and all the cannon till noon of the next day. But this is not at all likely, for it is certain that this battle fixed Philip in that throne, the possession of which was the ground of this bloody war. But to return to the Low Countries.

Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough arriving at the army on the 20th of April, 1710, N. S., decamped that very night, to seize on the bridge at Vendin, and the upper grounds of Courieres. The French no sooner saw the vanguard of the allies, but they quitted their lines, which covered Walloon-Flanders, and which had cost them so much raising; so that the Duke of Wirtemberg and Lieutenant-general Cadogan entered them, without so much as drawing a sword. On the other hand, Monsieur d'Artagnon, who was posted behind the Scarpe, with forty battalions and thirty squadrons, not only abandoned the river the very next day, but also the four towers, Marchiennes, Hanon, and St. Amand, threw some troops into Bouchain, and withdrew under the cannon of Arras. This successful opening of the campaign, was followed by the siege of Douay, invested the 23rd. This town, in which Philip the second, King of Spain, founded a university in 1560, was taken by Lewis XIV. in 1667, five days after the trenches were opened, since when that monarch had it regularly fortified, and raised a fort on the Scarpe half a quarter of a league distant from the town. We opened the trenches in two places on the north side of the river, the 3rd of May, at night. While we carried on our works, Marshal Villars, having re-enforced his army with all the men he could draw out of the garrisons, gave out that he would march to the succour of the town; and in effect appeared with his army between Lens and Taupou; he even made a detachment, which, advancing as far as Neuvirel and Berticourt, drew very near to the lines we had made before the grand army, to prevent being incommoded during the siege, as we had been at Lisle. These motions raised the hopes of the besieged, and animated them to a vigorous defence; but all their bravery could not save the place, which capitulated the 25th of June; the garrison, four days after, gave the allies possession of that and Fort Scarpe, and marched out with all the marks of honour, to be conducted to Cambray.

The partisan du Moulin attempted to surprise Louvain, but was disappointed by the bravery of the burghers. On the 5th of August he detached a party, who scaled the wall between the old and new gate of Brussels, where the ditch is dry, and having the good fortune to enter the town without being perceived, disarmed the burghers' guard, opened a gate, and let in their comrades to the number of four or five hundred; who posting themselves in St. James's churchyard, sent a party thence to the heart of the town, who seized upon the guild, and secured the burghers' grand guard. After this expedition, they intended to possess themselves of the other gates; the garrison, which was but a hundred and fifty men, having withdrawn, on the first notice, into the castle. In the interim, the whole town was alarmed, and the burgher-master awaking with the noise made in the streets, ran disguised to St. Peter's church, where he shut himself in and rang the alarum bell. Immediately the burghers took to their arms, and, headed by Van de Ven, marched to the square, and drew up in order before the guard. Du Moulin hearing that all was in motion, sent in all speed an officer on horseback, to see how matters went. He came to the square with his drawn sword in his hand, and threatened the burghers to fire the town, if they did not lay down their arms: but this menace was so far from having the desired effect, that one of them fired at him, and the ball taking him in the throat, tumbled him dead from his horse. The burgher-master immediately ordered the inhabitants to repair from their different quarters to the gate the enemy had opened, and retake it; while he, at the head of his company, marched with beat of drum to St. James's churchyard to dislodge the French. But they, fearing they should be cut off from the gate, thought of nothing but their retreat; and it was time for them to do it, for the burghers arrived just as they left the churchyard, and hooted them as they went off.

In our march to the siege of Douay, one Morgan Jones stole from me one of my mares, and I was obliged to purchase another, which I did of a hussar, who, as I apprehended, had stolen it from a boor. This latter found her in my possession, though I had docked, trimmed, and endeavoured to disguise her; but to no purpose, the peasant was not to be deceived; he knew and claimed his beast. I denied her to be his property, as I had bought and paid for her: and told him I would not part with my right; I talked big, and thought to carry it off with a high hand; but the fellow complaining to Lord Orrery, and making oath the mare was his, I was ordered by his lordship to return the man his beast, at night, when we were come to our journey's end, which I accordingly did, but could never get my money back from the hussar. Soon after, a friend of mine, found where the Welchman had sold my mare, which I recovered; and my husband meeting Morgan Jones, gave him a sound drubbing for his thieving.

After the reduction of Douay, the allies encamped with the right near the head of the Lave, and the left near that of Souchet, behind the Scarpe, whence a detachment of twenty-six battalions and eighteen squadrons was detached to invest Bethune, on the 5th of July; and on the 22nd, Baron Fagel and Count Schuitenburg opened the trenches, one on the side of St. Andrew's gate, and one before that of the Holy Ghost. The town was well furnished with everything necessary for the holding out a long siege; it was defended by deep ditches, a great number of mines, double outworks on the side of the low grounds; one would have thought it was out of danger, they being lain under water, had double outworks, and was on a stony soil. The allies, however, found means to drain off the water on that side where the grounds were drowned, and having carried on their work without being molested by mines, preparations were made on the 28th to give the assault to the outworks; but the besieged, not daring to expose themselves to it, hung out a white ensign. At Count Schuitenburg's attack, Baron Fagel resenting the governor's not doing the like on his side, continued to push on his works; and thinking his honour at stake, threatened, in case they longer delayed to do it, to lay all in ashes. Monsieur de Vauban, who commanded in the town, made some difficulty of this, because, as he alleged, there was no breach as yet on the side of the baron's attack; however, he was at length obliged to give way. The capitulation was signed, the garrison left the town on the 30th, with all the marks of honour, and was conducted to Arras.

As ours was one of the regiments which covered the siege,

I had no occasion to run into danger. Captain Montgomery, who would serve volunteer at this siege, was killed by a musket-ball; and while it continued, all our foragers had like to have been cut off: Marshal Villars had detached several squadrons to attack us, which fell on those that were to protect us, and soon made them give way; but our foragers making head, and sustaining them, the tables were turned in our favour, and we drove the enemy with great slaughter: fresh troops coming to their assistance, we were compelled to retreat to a village, where we expected succour from our army. We were soon surrounded, and summoned by the French to surrender, but we refusing, they attacked us in front, but were in their turn obliged to retreat at the approach of the piquet-guard. In this excursion for forage, I got out of a barn a large bolster full of wheat, two pots of butter, and a great quantity of apples, all which I carried safe to my tent. The wheat I got ground at a mill the enemy had deserted, and made pies, which I sold in the camp: of the bran I made starch.

After the reduction of Bethune, as soon as the works were filled up, and the breaches hastily repaired, or rather botched up, the Prince of Orange, stadtholder of Frise, invested St. Venant on the 4th of September, with twenty battalions; as on the same day the Prince d'Anhalt-Dessau, with forty battalions, did Aire. Monsieur de Guebriant, who commanded in the latter, made all the necessary preparations for a vigorous defence. The drains we were obliged to make at St. Venant, to carry off the water, were a great hindrance to the siege, for the trenches were not opened till the 16th, at nine at night, between the road to Busne and that to Robec, by two thousand workmen, supported by four battalions; and, nine days after, our batteries began to play. We gave several assaults to the outworks, and almost carried them on the 28th, at night, and as the besieged saw we were going to raise batteries to play on the body of the town, they capitulated on the 29th, and were allowed to march out with all the marks of honour. Our regiment, I mean that to which my husband belonged, marched with the prince to the siege; and the English being commanded to attack the counterscarp, my husband, who was unjustly forced to do another man's duty, being in the front rank, firing on his knee, received a musket-ball in his thigh: I was just then got into the rear of those who attacked, being willing to get as near to my husband as possible, when I saw his comrades bring him off; I was greatly troubled, but felt nothing like the grief which seized me when I found my dear Richard Welsh among the dead; I knew nothing more dangerous for him than to catch cold, as it was commonly fatal, wherefore I stripped off my clothes to my stays and under-petticoat to cover him up warm, and his comrades carried him to the trench, where Mr. White, the surgeon, who searched and dressed his wound, said it was but slight, but the next day, finding the bone broken, judged it mortal. When St. Venant had surrendered, our wounded men were carried to the army at Aire, before which town the Prince d'Anhalt-Dessau opened the trenches in two places on the 12th of September, at night. One on the left of the hornwork, adjoining to the gate of Arras, against the bastion of St. Stephen's gate; and the other before the old castle, on the side of the village of St. Quentin. The stony ground, the great ruins we had this autumn, and the brave defence the besieged made, contributed to the length and difficulty of this siege. The garrison disputed the ground inch by inch, and behaved with exemplary courage; the allies, however, surmounted all these obstacles; they at length threw bridges over the first ditch for the fifth time, for the garrison had burnt the bridges no less than four times; carried the covered way in the beginning of November, filled up the ditch which led to the breach, and having prepared the last batteries, compelled the garrison to beat the chamade on the 8th, between five and six in the evening. The next morning the governor waited on the Duke of Marlborough to draw up the articles; at night he gave up to the allies one of the gates of the town and Fort St. Francis, and on the 11th the garrison marched out with four pieces of cannon, two mortars, and all the marks of honour. This siege put a period to the campaign, we were ordered into into winter-quarters, and our wounded men sent to the hospital at Lisle, where my husband daily grew worse, had his wound often laid open; but at length it turned to a mortification, and in ten weeks' time after he received it, carried him off.

As in this town I had no acquaintance, I had no business. Brigadier Preston was the only one I knew, and he from a pure motive of generosity allowed me a crown a week, and a dinner every Tuesday, if I ought not to attribute this goodness to a grateful remembrance of the care I took of him when he was lain up with a wound he received at Ramillies. Over and above this, whenever he had any entertainment, I was allowed, for my assisting the cook, to carry away with me victuals sufficient for three or four days' support.

The unanimity of the allies was the principal cause of a successful war; but now the divisions, which were revived in England between the Whigs and Tories, paved the way to, and at last concluded, a less advantageous peace than might have been expected from such a number of conquests, and so many glorious victories.

About the 8th of April, N. S., the Emperor Joseph was attacked with a violent distemper, which in spite of all the advice of his physicians, daily increased; and no wonder, since they at length discovered that the remedies they had prescribed, were contrary to the nature of his malady, which proved to be the small-pox. However, he was not thought in danger till the 15th; but the next day his imperial majesty complained of a great heat in his bowels, and a great heaviness and distraction in his head. This, augmenting the consternation the court was in, caused so great disputes among the physicians, that they passed the whole night in disputes, and came to no conclusion till the morning, when the Emperor was past taking any remedy, and he had but life enough to receive the sacraments; after which the nuncio having given him the apostolical benediction, he gave up the ghost at ten o'clock, in his palace at Vienna, in the thirty-third year of his age.

The grand army was early drawn together at Orchies, where it remained till the 30th of April, N. S., and from thence marched on the side of the plain of Douay, without entering upon anything of importance, on account of the French giving out that they would send a large body of troops into Germany, under the command of the Elector of Bavaria, to take advantage of the consternation caused by the death of the Emperor; but these designs proved abortive, by the allies having the precaution to send a very considerable detachment to the Upper Rhine. Though nothing of consequence was undertaken on either side, after we had taken post between Valenciennes and Douay, we had two or three skirmishes with the enemy; and on the arrival of Prince Eugene, marched to Lens, to give the French a fair opportunity to come to a general battle; they made a show of being inclined to it, by laying bridges over the Scheld, and altering the situation of their army, though they had no such intention: however, seven or eight hundred of our men were ordered to force a fortified post at Arleux, whom I followed, in the piquet-guard, sent to support them, in case they should be succoured by the French. Our detachment carried the post, made several prisoners, and began to fortify themselves strongly in it, a large body of troops being sent to cover them. These the French surprised in the night, and put into disorder; but those whom they were to cover, awaking, and falling on in their shirts, sword in hand, the others rallied, and the enemy was repulsed. The next morning, going into the wood near our small camp, I found a hussar's horse tied to a tree, with a tent upon his back, as good as new; the horse, though but a low one, was very handsome, and mighty fleet: I suppose the owner, who was one of the enemy who attacked us in the night, had not time to lead him off. The French, after our removal, retook this post.

During this time of inaction (for I account such bickerings hardly worth notice), the Prince of Orange, who had shown me so great humanity in my affliction for the death of my first husband, quitted the army to make a tour to the Hague, to terminate the difference between his highness and the King of Prussia, with regard to the inheritance of King William's estates. He left us on the 11th of July, N. S., but to my great sorrow for the loss of my generous benefactor, he was drowned at Moerdyk, on the 14th, being about twenty-four years of age; his body was found on the 22nd, by a boat of Bergopzoom.

A few days after this fatal accident, the general of the allies gave out that they would attack, on the side of Arras, the lines the French had drawn to cover the country of Artois, behind which they had hitherto lain. In effect, the Duke of Marlborough, having advanced as far as Villers-Brulin, which was but two leagues from those lines, ordered the horse to cut several thousand fascines to fill up the ditch; and on the 31st of July, N. S., sent the heavy baggage to La Basse, under the conduct of General Hompesch, that he might have no encumbrance. This detachment, which seemed designed for nothing more than an escort, being joined by part of the garrisons of Douay, Lisle, and St. Amand, and being increased to eight thousand foot and two thousand horse, General Hompesch, their commander, directed his march with all the expedition possible towards Arleux, and Bac a Bacheul, to pass their the river Senset, from which the Marshal Villars had withdrawn his forces to strengthen his army, believing he should be attacked in his lines; but the allies, who had only amused him, precipitately decamping on the 4th of August, N. S., at night, and dividing themselves into four columns, marched by the way of Nouville and Talu straight to Vitry, where they crossed the Scarpe, and from thence towards Arleux and Bac a Bacheul to support Count Hompesch, who was already there. The Duke of Marlborough, that he might get thither soon enough, went before, with all the horse of the right wing. Marshal Villars could scarce believe the first intelligence he received of this march; but having advice by which he was convinced, he also raised his camp. However, as the allies were too far before him, and it was not possible for him to overtake them with his whole army, he placed himself at the head of twenty squadrons, to dispute them the passage of Senset. But having crossed a defile near Marquiou, he found Count Hompesch drawn up in order of battle on the other side the river, supported by the Duke of Marlborough at the head of the horse. The good countenance they showed, prevented his taking advantage of the distance of the rest of the army, which did not get, till night, as far as Oisy, and made him determine on a retreat. The crossing the Senset rendered the French lines useless, for it gave the allies an entrance into the enemy's country, without the loss of a man, and was looked upon as a masterstroke of the Duke of Marlborough. The first consequence of this expedition was the siege of Bouchain, which, on the 12th, Baron Fagel invested with thirty battalions and twelve squadrons.

Marshal Villars, to impede the siege, and keep a communication with the town, raised an intrenchment near Marquette which was extended as far as the morass of Bouchain, and in it posted twenty battalions: the besiegers, notwithstanding this, undertook to close their circumvallation on that side, and carried it from the rising ground to the morass between the enemy's intrenchment and the town, and at length, by extending it across the morass by making firm ground, with pontoons, fascines, and blinds, quite finished it. This having rendered the marshal's endeavours fruitless, on the 23rd, at night, three trenches were opened, one against the lower, the other two against the upper town. On the 30th, about half an hour past seven, our batteries began to play, and made such a terrible fire the subsequent days, that the garrison, not being able to stand, made but feeble opposition to our approaches, so that on the 11th of September we were masters of the half-moon at the attack of the lower town, and the breaches were made at the two other attacks; which obliged the governor to capitulate at two in the afternoon next day; but as he was refused all composition, the parley was broken off, and the attack renewed: however, about midnight, he again ordered the chamade to be beat; consented to surrender prisoners of war, and soon after delivered up a gate to the besiegers. The garrison, which made, still, three thousand men, marched out on the 14th, and were conducted, taking the road of Marchiennes, to be carried by water to Ghent and Sas van Ghent. Our army entered on no other expedition this campaign.

During this siege I was constantly employed in my Lord Stair's kitchen, under his cook, into which Colonel K—— coming, would have been rude enough, if I had not disengaged myself with a case-knife, just as Lord Forrester came in, who asked what was the matter; I told him the colonel was but a bad judge of mankind, who were to be read by their actions; had he considered that the love I bore my husband had brought me in search of him for many years, in a red coat, exposed to all the dangers and hardships of a soldier's life, he would not have made an attempt so unbecoming his character, and so little probable of succeeding. The colonel said he only intended to kiss me. My lord commended and rewarded my virtue with a piece of gold, while he gave the colonel a gentle and friendly reprimand, who, poor gentleman, a few days after, had his heel taken off by a musket-ball, which wound laid him up for a considerable time. As I was one day a marauding near the besieged town, I got a basket full of fowls and pigeons, which I presented to the wounded colonel, to whom I was reconciled, as he had begged my pardon; these were no trifling matters, considering the French army and ours were so near each other that there was hardly subsistence for both ; to which I may add the danger of stirring abroad, when a number of the enemy's parties were always in motion. The colonel took this present in so good part, that he gave me three barrels of strong beer he had in his quarters, and has been ever since very generous to me, which I cannot say of a great many others, to whom I have been much more serviceable. Nothing happened to me in particular all this campaign of 1711, which was the last the Duke of Marlborough made, to the no small regret of the whole army, by whom he was entirely beloved, not only for his courage and conduct, but equally dear to us all for his affability and humanity.

During the siege of Bouchain, Charles III., King of Spain, was elected Emperor, of whose affairs, with relation to the Spanish monarchy, the succession to which was the principal ground of the war, it will not be amiss to take a short view. After Philip had won the victory of Villa Viciosa last year, 1710, he once more became master of the whole kingdom of Aragon, the subjects of which were obliged to renew their oaths of allegiance to him. This reduction being made, the Duke of Noailles, at the head of fifty squadrons and forty battalions, invested Gironne on the 16th of December ; he opened the trench before the red Fort, and having carried it, attacked the town on the same side. On the 13th of January, N.S., two breaches were of a sufficient width ; but on that day there fell such a violent rain, that it drowned most of their works, and the water overflowing, undermined and overthrew their batteries, laying all the adjacent grounds under water ; which reduced the besiegers to great straits, as it hindered their going to the barns, which served them for magazines. When the rain ceased, they began to repair the damage ; the miners renewed their labour, and on the morning of the 24th they sprang a mine, which had all the effect they could desire ; and the besiegers mounting the breach sword in hand, carried the first intrenchment, and were preparing to attack the second, when Count Tellenbach, governor of the town, sent to the Duke of Noailles to capitulate. The garrison had their liberty granted, and the French entered the town on the 26th.

After the rendition of Gironne the troops went into winter-quarters ; Philip chose Saragossa, to be at hand to give his orders ; he made great preparations, and new levies, giving out that they were designed for the siege of Barcelona. In the interim, Count Staremberg having received from England large remittances of money, and some troops from Italy, which increased his army to thirty-six battalions and forty-four squadrons, opportunely possessed himself of Pratz del Rey, a very advantageous post, from which all the endeavours of the enemy could not remove him. Wherefore, while the two armies were disputing the ground, the Duke of Vendome, that he might lose no time, detached Count Muret with three thousand men, whom he soon after re-enforced with the like number, to form the siege of Cardona. This town could hardly be said to be fortified; but it had a good castle, and a numerous garrison. It was invested the 14th of November. The old towers were soon demolished by the enemy's cannon; and on the 17th, in the morning, the besiegers having made an assault, carried the rampart, entered the town, made a cruel slaughter, and obliged such of the inhabitants as had not withdrawn into the castle, to surrender prisoners of war. Being masters of the town, they turned all their strength against the castle, the garrison of which, having hopes of succour, employed all possible means for their defence. They were reduced to the eating their horses and asses, when Count Staremberg sent a detachment, which on the 21st of December, being advanced within half a league of the castle, drove the besiegers, and vigorously repelled twelve companies of grenadiers, which attacked them near the spring of Aqua Rosa, to dislodge them. The rest of that day and the next were employed in keeping the enemy in motion, to gain a passage for four hundred men, laden with provisions, into the castle; which was luckily effected, by the besiegers abandoning their post on the approach of the troops, which sustained the convoy: they, however, very strenuously endeavoured to gain the rising ground, which the allies had in possession, but all their efforts were ineffectual; and after having lost two thousand men, killed or taken, they thought fit to retreat, and carry off what baggage they could: they left, notwithstanding, in their camp, fourteen pieces of cannon, four field-pieces, four mortars, a number of mules, with a good store of provision and baggage. This loss made the Duke of Vendome take the advantage of the night and a great fog, to decamp from Pratz del Rey.

The allies never had so numerous an army in Flanders, as this year; and the Duke of Ormond, who succeeded the Duke of Marlborough in the command of our forces, in passing through the Hague, protested he would exert himself to bring the French to listen to reason. Notwithstanding which, when a fair opportunity offered, and a resolution was taken to attack them, he declared he had no orders to act against the French. The other generals were quite enraged to see the enemy escape such an evident danger. However, they could not think of remaining inactive the whole campaign with so fine an army, and notwithstanding the Duke of Ormond refused to employ any part of our forces in the siege of Quesnoy, that town was invested by the rest of the allies on the 8th of June, with twenty squadrons and thirty battalions under the command of General Fagel. Though in that season there is very little light, and the moon was then at full, these inconveniences did not prevent the opening the trenches, two before the ponds, on the right and left of the wood, and a third, on the 23rd, at night, to divide the forces of the besieged. The town would have capitulated on the 3rd of July, but they could get no better terms than to be made prisoners of war.

New instructions were sent to the Duke of Ormond; in consequence of which, he withdrew from the rest of the army, encamped at Avene-le-sec, with all our English troops, consisting of twenty battalions and nineteen squadrons, and proclaimed a suspension of arms at the head of our camp.

To the end the allies might be rendered incapable to undertake anything considerable against France, the Duke of Ormond endeavoured to draw off the German troops in English pay, and to bring them to enter into the suspension of arms; with this design he gave them advice of his going off, and summoned them to follow him: but they refusing to obey, except only one battalion and four squadrons of Holstiens, and two of Walef, he sent the same orders again to the Prince d'Anhalt-Dessau, general of the Prussian troops. This Prince returned for answer, that he had received one from the King his master, with command to obey the English general in whatever should not be contrary to his instructions, by which he was enjoined to act offensively as well as defensively; and if he received contrary orders, the king commanded him to withdraw, and join his forces to Prince Eugene's army. The Prince of Hesse-Cassel, also summoned to follow us, thus addressed himself to the officer who carried him the order : Sir, tell the Duke of Ormond that the Hessian troops desire nothing more ardently than to march, provided it be to engage the French : I will do myself the honour to acquaint his Excellency with the reason I cannot now obey his orders. The army decamping from Haspre on the 15th of July, to march to Thian, the Danish, Prussian, Saxon, &c., troops in English pay, left us and joined Prince Eugene. Though the withdrawing our forces considerably weakened the army, the allies undertook the siege of Landrecy, which the Prince d'Anhalt-Dessau, with thirty-five battalions and thirty squadrons, invested on the 17th.

When we decamped, the Duke of Ormond made a feint of taking the Ypres road, and of staying in that neighbourhood ; but soon changed his route, and made an expeditious march towards Ghent and Bruges, which two places he surprised and garrisoned ; and thus became master of the pass of those convoys, which the allies received by the Lis and Scheld.

On the 19th of July, France gave possession of Dunkirk to the troops the Queen sent thither from England.

I left the allies before Landrecy ; who, to keep open a communication with Douay, Tournay, and Marchiennes, had posted eleven imperial regiments and six battalions in an intrenchment at Denain on the Scheld. Marshal Villars being informed very minutely of the strength and disposition of the allies, and consequently of the corps at Denain, as it was given out, by the Duke of Ormond, resolved to surprise these troops. After several false motions to deceive the allies, and to make them believe he intended to succour Landrecy, he on a sudden changed his route, and being re-enforced by the garrisons of Cambray and Valenciennes, on the 24th of July, he with his whole army furiously fell upon the little camp at Denain. It was impossible for the Earl of Albemarle who commanded this body, to withstand the whole French army, or even to retreat, as we had taken away the most convenient bridges. Wherefore, after a short but very sharp engagement, the intrenchment was carried, and all who defended it, officers and soldiers, were killed in the action. The next day, the victorious French appeared before Marchiennes, but a weak town, which they took with little trouble, though it was defended by seven or eight battalions under the command of Brigadier Berkhofer. Here they found not only all the artillery and ammunition designed for the siege of Landrecy, but all the provisions, brought together at a prodigious expense, for the support of the army.

The court of France, on the advice of this success, no longer doubted of the allies being compelled to accept of such conditions of peace as the English and French had prescribed them: they were confirmed in this opinion by the taking a hundred and fifty barks laden with ammunition and provisions, not to reckon the other booty the French made; the raising the siege of Landrecy, and the retreat of the allies towards Mons. In effect, those losses had so greatly weakened the confederates, that far from being in a condition to undertake any enterprize, they were not able to prevent Marshal Villars retaking several towns this campaign.

The marshal being flushed with his turn of fortune, re-enforced his army, by draughts from several garrisons; invested Douay on the 3rd of August, and on the 4th, at night, opened the trenches before the town, and before Fort de la Scarpe. He left the care of the siege to Marshal Montesquieu and Count Albergotti, while he himself, with the grand army, observed the motions of Prince Eugene; who, after the raising the siege of Landrecy, had retired, and advanced very near to Tournay to succour the besieged, did he find it feasible. He encamped at Seelin, extending his right towards Noailles, and his left as far as Mons en Pevele. After he had been several times to reconnoitre the enemy's lines, it was thought too dangerous an attempt to attack them: however, the prince spread a report, that the army would march to the relief of the town, and actually they decamped and drew near to the enemy; but as this motion was made with no other view than to encourage the besieged, the army soon returned to its post. General Hompesch, who had thrown himself into the town, with some troops, before it was invested, defended himself with all the bravery that could be expected with a weak and an ill-provided garrison. He held out till the 10th of September, and was allowed no other conditions than that of surrendering prisoners of war. Before the end of this siege, and after Prince Eugene's retreat, Marshal Villars marched towards Valenciennes; and on the 8th of September, having led his troops over the Scheld, he advanced to the plain of Sebourg, to deprive the allies of all communication with Quesnoy; and that he might entirely cut it off, he threw up an intrenchment behind the little river d'Hanneau, by which having straitened the town, he invested it in form. On the 18th he opened the trenches in three several places; at the gate of Valenciennes, at that of Cambray, and between these two gates; some days after he opened another before the gate of the wood, that he might divide the fire of the besieged. General Ivoy commanded in the town, which they had scarcely had time to fortify; the governor defended himself with all imaginable bravery; but the French, notwithstanding, carrying on their works with the utmost vigour, made themselves masters of the outworks without great loss; and having made a breach, filled up the ditch and finished the galleries, all the grenadiers of the army were commanded to prepare for a general assault on the 4th of October. Before it was given, the marshal summoned the governor, who not being strong enough to withstand the enemy, beat the chamade about four in the afternoon, and was obliged to undergo the same fate with the garrison of Douay. Towards the end of the siege of Quesnoy, the Chevalier Luxemburg invested Bouchain, having first driven all the cattle in the neighbourhood, part of which he sent to Cambray; and opened the trenches the very day that Quesnoy surrendered. The town was attacked with such resolution, that, having but five hundred men in garrison, these were obliged to surrender on the 20th. The garrison left the place the next day, and was conducted to Chateau Cambresis, and from thence to Rheims.

In the midst of these disasters, the garrison of Ostend gained a considerable advantage over the French. Monsieur Caris, governor of that town, being informed of the weak condition of the garrison of Fort Knoque, sent the partisan La Rue, with a hundred and fourscore men, who by by-ways, got thither on the 4th of October, at night. There were four houses between the drawbridge and the fort; in these they found means to conceal themselves, and, at the gate opening, seized upon the two nearest bridges, surprised the guard, possessed themselves of the other gates, and disarmed the garrison. This was the last expedition of the campaign in 1712.

to England; which he not only signed, but generously ordered Major M——y to give me money enough to defray my charges; though he gave me but ten shillings, which I am satisfied was much less than the duke designed me; for every one, whether friends or enemies to his grace, will allow he was not close-fisted. I left Ghent, and went by water to Dunkirk, where I was kindly received by our regiment, garrisoned in this town. As I was obliged to wait here some time for the packet-boat's arrival, I went to pay my respects to the governor, General Hill, to have my pass signed: he was then very ill and confined to his bed. He, however, signed it, sent me two pistoles, and a compliment, that had he not been ill he would have seen me; directing orders to be given to the commander of the packet, to respect me as an officer's widow. During my stay here, I was going to take pot-luck with Colonel Ingram, and accidentally meeting him in the way, I told him I designed to fowl a plate with him; said he, I should be glad if you would defer the favour to another day, as a set of officers are invited to dine with Brigadier Durel, and it is probable, that beside a better dinner, you may get wherewithal to defray your charges to England. I thanked him for the hint, and took his advice, but they had dined before I got thither. Durel seeing by my looks I was disappointed, asked me if I would take up with a morsel at the servants' table. O' my conscience, said I, you have shown the height of good breeding, to sit down before I came, for I don't suppose but Ingram had acquainted the company that I intended them the honour of mine; however, my pride shall never defraud my belly, and I don't know but I go into the politer company of the two; for had they known, as you did, that a person of my distinction would condescend to grace their table, they would show the good manners you have wanted, and wait my coming. They all laughed at the gravity with which I delivered myself, and I left them to get my dinner, reprimanding Durel for his want of respect to a lady of my rank and figure. Having eat heartily, and very much at my ease, I returned to, and took a cheerful bottle with the company, the Brigadiers Durel, Godfrey, Clayton, Sir Robert Monroe, and Colonel Harrison. One of the company was in a fine laced suit, of which, taking more than ordinary care, raised a desire in the rest to have them spoiled: they, to that end, plied him well with wine, never let the bottle stand still, but pushed it round, in hopes he would either spill the wine upon his clothes, or stain them with a second flask ; but the care of them increased as he grew drunk, and they were disappointed of their aim : this made them propose the mischief to me, and as I loved a little roguery as well as the best of them, I pretended I could not finish my bottle. The company, except the gentleman in the fine clothes, who was heartily in for it, seemed willing to excuse me ; but he, who sat next me, swore I should take my glass in my turn : the more reluctance I showed, the more strenuously he insisted upon my pledging him every time the glass came round ; at length I told him, if he forced me to drink when it went against my stomach, I might, however unwillingly, be offensive to the company, and particularly to himself and Brigadier Godfrey, between whom I sat. All arguments were vain, as commonly they are with drunken people (and he was far from being sober),—drink I should, let the consequence be never so fatal. I was very sober, but willing to gratify the rest of the company, and show the brigadier the effects of obstinacy, which are commonly loss and disgrace, took my glass, and prepared to cast. At the third glass, after the dispute, I again desired him to excuse me, for I found another bumper would overcharge me. He was deaf to all I could urge ; drink it I must, and drink it I did, to his great mortification ; for I set open a flood-gate, which falling like a cataract, spread ruin and desolation over one side of his clothes ; the colour of which changed to a dismal hue, and all the glory of the glittering lace sunk oppressed by an inundation of indigested wine. A pallid ire now o'er-spread his cheeks, and indignation sparkled in his eyes, while fetid fumes arising from the flood, forced him to strip, and at a distance hurl the now-polluted robe. But to quit my heroics ; however angry he was, he did all he could to conceal it, as he thought he alone was in fault, for he had not the least notion of his misfortune being designed. His clothes he could wear no more till that side was taken off, and a new one supplied. However, though he supposed it a mischance, and not premeditated, he could not forget or forbear telling me of it every time he saw me afterwards ; but I excused myself by throwing the blame on him. I pretended to be very sick and fuddled, and was for taking my leave, but the gentlemen would not part with me till they had contributed to the charges of my voyage, giving me two crowns a-piece.

Soon after, I embarked for England, and being arrived, took lodgings at the Queen's Head, Charing-Cross; having rested myself three or four days, I waited on the Duke of Marlborough; in my way to his grace's house met Colonel Chidley, and told him to whom I was going, and what was my errand, which my reader may suppose was to get some provision made for me, in consideration of my own service and the loss of two husbands in her Majesty's. The colonel told me that he was afraid the duke had no interest; however, advised me to go, as I did, and was very humanely received by his grace, who expressed a concern that he could not serve me, and gave me a gentle reprimand for not coming to England when he sent, and had the power to do for me. Indeed his grace was so very generous to send for me, before he resigned his command, which I forgot to mention in its proper place. I returned my lord duke thanks for the good intentions he had, and took my leave; at going away, he clapped a guinea in my hand, and honoured me with his good wishes. My hopes being here frustrated, I was resolved to try if I might have any better success with my lord Duke of Argyle, who was still in the enjoyment of his sovereign's favour. Accordingly, the next day, I set out for his grace's house, but near King-street, Westminster, I met him in his chair. The duke first espied me, and asking a footman of his, to whom I was perfectly well known; whether that was not Mother Ross? being answered in the affirmative, stopped his chair. He asked me several questions, how long I had been in England, &c., and lastly, where I lodged? I answered him, that it was in one of your houses of civil conversation, more frequented than any one in Flanders, and more noted for the modest company and conversation to be found there; which was the reason that the officer of the parish, who represented her majesty, very often did my landlady the honour of his visits, and not seldom invited the ladies under her tuition to a palace of his, known by the name of the Round-house. His grace smiled, and giving me a guinea, bid me go to his house, and wait his return, saying he would consider how something might be done to provide for me; bid me inquire for Macquin, who, with Sawney Ross, were the only two of the duke's domestics to whom I was known. According to my orders, I inquired for the former of these two, and was shown into the housekeeper's room, who went up to her lady, and told her that I was in the house. Her grace having had my character from her lord, sent for me to her apartment; made me sit down; breakfast with her, and tell the story of my adventures: which I did in the best manner I could; and though I was as concise as possible, I believe I omitted no material event that regarded me in particular. Her grace was so complaisant as to appear pleased with the account I gave, and I am sure was very much so when I related his grace's escape at Rousselart, telling me, for that advice which I gave her lord of the enemy's approach, she should always esteem me, and do me any service I could ask that was in her power, and remember me to her latest hour; and indeed her grace kept her word, for she heaped many favours on me, which I mention in honour to her conjugal affection for her lord, and with true sense of the many obligations her humane goodness has lain me under. When I had finished my story, my lady duchess made me a present of a guinea and a half, enjoining me silence, lest it might prevent her lord from making me any. I had scarce made an end of my narrative, when his grace came in, and finding us together, was very merry with her grace receiving in her bedchamber, and conversing with, a dragoon. When dinner was ready, my lord duke would have done me the honour of seating me at his table; but as there was company, I begged to be excused, and with much entreaty was permitted to dine at the second, from whence, after our meal was over, my lord sent for me to the company, with whom I sate till evening. My lady duchess, who saw me under some restraint, and at a loss how to behave before a person of her character and quality, soon left us; in getting off her chair she kissed me, saying, I know you and my lord will be better company, and talk over your camp adventures with more freedom in my absence; but I desire you will let us see you often, and be better acquainted. Her grace judged very right; for on her retiring, we ripped up old stories, and were as merry as so many new-paid-off sailors. There were with my lord two of his aids-de-camp, who had as good memories as I had. When it grew dark, I took my leave, and my lord giving me another guinea, ordered me to get a petition drawn up for the Queen; to carry it to the Duke of Hamilton, and he himself would back it. As I went off, the two aids-de-camp made me a present of three crowns each.

As his grace of Argyle had advised me, I got a petition drawn, in which was set forth that for twelve years I had served in the Earl of Orkney's regiment as a man; that I had received several wounds, and lost two husbands in the service. With this I waited on Duke Hamilton, who said, as he did not know me, I might possibly be an impostor; my bare assertion not being sufficient proof of my service. I replied, that I would appeal to any officer in the army, as I believed that I was known to all, though I did not know them all. His grace answering, he required no greater confirmation, went into a parlour, where I heard some discourse pass, but could distinguish nothing. After some little time I was ordered to go into the duke, and found two officers of our regiment, with whom I was intimately acquainted. They saluted me with a great deal of good nature, and confirmed to the duke all that I had advanced in my petition, saying much more in my favour than modesty will allow me to insert here. Well, said the duke, after having run through so many dangers together, you cannot but take a bottle at meeting. His grace called for one, and, having emptied it I took my leave; and going away the duke gave me a crown to have a new petition drawn to present to the Queen myself next morning; he intending to present her majesty the other that night. I thanked his grace, and was very punctual in following his instructions. I got my petition finely written out, dressed myself the best I could, the next day, and went to court, where I did not stay long before her majesty came down the great stairs (at the bottom of which I had planted myself), led by the Duke of Argyle, who I suppose was talking of me, because her majesty eyed me very earnestly, and his grace often smiled upon me. As soon as she came down, I fell on my right knee, as I had been instructed by the yeomen of the guard, and delivered my petition, which the Queen was graciously pleased to receive with a smile, and helping me up, said, It should be her care to provide for me; and perceiving me with child, added, If you are delivered of a boy I will give him a commission as soon as he is born: but to my sorrow it proved a girl, who has caused me great trouble and vexation. Her majesty was further pleased to give me an order to the Earl of Oxford for fifty pounds, to defray the charge of my lying-in. I often waited on that noble lord, but could neither get money nor access, which I humbly represented to the Queen, who gave me, in her great goodness, a second order for that sum to Sir William Windham, who paid it me without the trouble of going twice to receive it.

Some time after I was brought to bed of the child I went with when I presented my petition to the Queen, Lord Forrester and Lord Fofard ordered me to be at the King's Arms in Pall Mall, where they were to dine with some other noblemen and gentlemen of the army, designing to make a collection for my immediate support. I was punctual to the time their lordships had appointed; but none of the company being yet come, I waited at the door, with my child in my arms. While I was at my post, a soldier who had served abroad, seeing me, very wisely concluded that I was a lewd woman, and began to treat me as such in the grossest language; and after a volley of G—d d—me's, mixed with the common flowers of rhetoric b—h and w—re, said, it was a burning shame the nobility should encourage a pack of idle lewd b——s, and support them and their b——ds with that bread which they ought rather to distribute among such as had ventured their lives, and spilled their blood in the service of their country; he concluded this friendly salutation with a blow of his stick across my breasts. The language he had given me was provocation sufficient to inflame me; but a blow was an indignity never before put upon me, and enraged me to such a degree, that not considering I had the child in one arm, I flew upon him, and began to belabour him with my right fist. A drawer who saw the disadvantage I was under, took the child from me, and having both hands at liberty, I gave him such a thorough beating, that he cried out for quarter; but I, deaf to everything but resentment, rolled him in the kennel, and had demolished him if he had not promised to beg pardon in the most submissive manner, which indeed he did, alleging in defence of his insolence that he did not know me, but now that he was informed who I was, he was ready to acknowledge I deserved whatever was done for me, and would show me more respect for the future. Out of evil, it is said, often comes good: this insult, and the consequential battle, proved very lucky to me, for it happened as the quality was returning from court, who stopped their chariots to be spectators of the fray, in which I received neither hurt nor loss, but that of my sarccenet hood being torn, which however was amply repaired by the money Lord Harvey and the Marquis of Winchester threw me out of the tavern window, and that I had from others of the nobility, which amounted to upwards of nine pounds, besides a large quantity of untouched provisions from the tables of such quality as dined at the King's Arms that day.

A few days after this, as I was sauntering in the Court of Requests, I met with two of my countrywomen, who sold fruit, &c.: one of them, a single woman, named Judith, was my acquaintance in Ireland; the other, whose name was Mary, had only two husbands, one living in Ireland, and one in Drury-lane. This latter, as two of a trade can never agree, took it into her head to reflect on the reputation of the former, who, good-natured girl, always traded on her own bottom, whereas the other not only dealt on her own stock, but got money also by other folks' wares. As I was talking with Judith, I thought it a piece of impertinence, and an insult upon me, to attack her at that time, which I resented by giving her first a severe thrashing, and next, in a public manner, the discipline schoolmasters give their idle scholars, which afforded no small diversion to the spectators, especially to the gentlemen of the livery.

On a Saturday morning, the 15th of November, 1712, having some business at Kensington, as I went through Hyde Park, I saw four gentlemen jump over the ditch into the nursery, which made me suspect a duel, and hasten towards them to endeavour, if possible, to prevent mischief; but I could not get time enough, for they all four drew and engaged, two and two, with great animosity; one, who I found was Colonel Hamilton, instantly closed in and disarmed his antagonist, General Macartney, and at the same time the other two fell, the one upon the other. These were Lord Mohun, and the Duke of Hamilton; the former fell dead upon the spot, and the latter expired soon after. Colonel Hamilton was wounded in the instep, and Macartney, as some keepers came up, walked off, and was not taken; though a reward of several hundred pounds was offered for the apprehending him. Had I been examined as a witness in this affair, my affidavit might, possibly, have left no doubt; but it was very happy for me I was not thought of, as my evidence would in all probability have made enemies of my friends; having often experienced the charity of several noblemen, intimates of the deceased lords, and I must have disobliged one side, as I should have sworn to the truth of what my eyes had witnessed: which, as it is not now material, I shall not declare, but refer my readers to the history of those times.

It was not long after this, that, instigated by a strong desire to see my friends and native country, which I had not visited for some years, my circumstances being very easy by the Queen's bounty, and the charitable assistance of the nobility, and officers of the army, I wrote to my mother to let her know I would be in Dublin in a short time, and indeed got there before her, who, though upwards of a hundred years of age, travelled ten miles on foot to give me the meeting. The poor old woman, who had long given me over for dead, having in so many years heard nothing from or of me, wept for joy, and in such an excessive manner, when she embraced me, that I could not refrain mingling my tears with hers, my transport being equally as great. Upon inquiry after my children, I learned that the elder of them died at the age of eighteen, and that the younger was in the workhouse. The nurse, with whom, at my departure, I had left the best of my goods, together with my child, soon threw him upon the parish; her tenderness for my poor infant being measured by her interest, she was soon tired of the burden he was to her. Indeed, but one of those with whom I had intrusted my effects, was honest enough to give me any account of them, and that was Mr. Howell, father to the person who ruined my virgin innocence; all the others, like the nurse, thought the possession I had given them warranted their converting my goods to their own use, and looked upon me as an unreasonable woman to expect a return. My misfortune was, that the honest man had but few, and those the worst of my goods, which he kept safe, and restored justly. I had no better luck with regard to my house; for the person whom I left in it, when I went to Holland, dying, one Bennet set up a claim to it as his freehold, and got possession, there being none in my absence to contest his title, and I could not oust him, as my writings were lost or destroyed: and indeed what could I have done had I had those evidences? I had not money sufficient to carry me through a law-suit, and to expect justice without money, is much the same as to think of reducing a fortified town without ammunition : I was therefore compelled to sit down by my loss, and think on some method to get an honest living. As I had before kept a public house, and was used to sutling in the army, I could think on nothing better than that of my former ; and accordingly, I took a house, put in a stock of beer, and by this and making pies I got a comfortable support, till my evil genius entangled me in a third marriage with a soldier named Davies. He had served in the first regiment of foot guards, in the Low Countries, but on the conclusion of the peace between France and the high allies, he was, at his own request, discharged from the service. His father dying during his absence, and leaving him a small partimony, he left Flanders and went to his brother, who lived near Chester, to take possession of the provision his father had made for him ; but his brother, who had lain hold of it, and knew he was not in circumstances to compel him to do justice, made a jest of his pretensions, and to this day keeps to himself what their father had designed for his support. This unexpected disappointment obliged him to betake himself, once more, to a military life, and coming over to Dublin, he was enrolled in the Welch fusileers. After my marriage with this man, I continued on my public business, till his regiment was ordered to Hereford, in the first year of King George I., when a weak effort was made in favour of the Pretender. I stayed behind him in Dublin no longer than was absolutely necessary to dispose of my effects ; which having done, I got a pass from the Secretary of War, and followed my husband to Hereford ; from thence I went to Gloucester, designing for London, where I intended to settle. The Jacobites being somewhat elated, some who were in the commission were little cautious in declaring their sentiments, and I met with a good deal of trouble with regard to the signing my pass, and also with the under officers, who were disaffected to the Hanover succession ; but the favour and contributions of his majesty's loyal subjects make me ample amends. At Colebrook I met Colonel Floyer, with whom I supped, and the next day, pursuing my journey, I arrived in London. While I was travelling to town, my husband was on his march to Preston, where the rebels were assembled.

Her late majesty, beside her bounty of fifty pounds, had ordered me a shilling a day subsistence for life, which the lord-treasurer Oxford, without the Queen's knowledge, reduced to five-pence. The ministry being now changed, I flattered myself that I should have justice done me, and be restored to my whole allowance of a shilling: with these hopes, I addressed myself to Mr. Craigs, who produced the warrant, and generously undertaking my affair, got the King's order for my receiving the shilling as intended by Queen Anne, which I have ever since enjoyed. I lost a good friend at the death of this gentlemen.

By the time the Preston rebellion was quelled, I had settled myself in a house in the Willow-walk, Tothill-fields, Westminster, where I took to making farthing pies and selling strong liquors, and had such success that I was soon able to purchase, at a large expense, a discharge for my husband, which was just so much money thrown away; for in two days after his arrival in town, being in drink, he enlisted in the guards.

One night after my husband was in bed, and I in a manner undressed, some frolicksome sparks, thinking they show a great deal of humour in being sillily mischievous, took it into their heads to tear up the pitching-place which I had made for porters to ease themselves by resting their burdens upon, and to throw that and the board on which I exposed my pies into the ditch; no doubt they would have done further mischief, had I not run down, followed by my husband and a lodger, all three almost naked, and put a stop to their career. I gave the worthy gentleman whom I first laid hold on, such a thorough rib-roasting, that he was glad to cry quarter, and to promise that he would make good the damage, and give us a treat for the pains we had taken to convince them, by weighty arguments, that the pitching-place and pie-board were more convenient where I had set them, than where they had thrown them.

The house I lived in, and two adjoining, I rented of — S——ley, Esq., at eight pounds a year. I repaired these, and bought the willows before them of a former tenant, by whom they had been planted. My landlord, notwithstanding, being in distress of money, let my tenements over my head to one B——by a bailiff, on a long lease, for the sake of a fine, which the said B——by paid him; without giving me the least intimation. The Sunday after the lease was signed, B——by let me know that for the future I was to pay my rent to him, that he thought the tenements under-let, and I must either agree to the raising my rent next quarter, or provide myself elsewhere. I used all the rhetoric I was capable of to divert him from so great cruelty, as I termed the raising my rent; but finding he had no bowels, and that entreaties and submission only flattered his pride and made him more obdurate, as is the nature of these low-bred upstarts, who are purse-proud, I resolved to vent my passion, which with much difficulty I had hitherto curbed, and changing my dialect, I treated him with all the opprobrious terms I could think of; and though I say it myself, there are very few, if any, of the academy of Billingsgate, was a greater proficient in the piscatory salutations. I hope my readers will not attribute this to me as a piece of vanity, when they reflect that quite through this long account of myself, I have all along guarded against that weakness, and only related pure matters of fact.

The next day, my new landlord brought a carpenter with him to lop my trees; I foreseeing this would be the ground of a quarrel, secured my husband, that he might not have an assault sworn against him by Bilby, and went out myself with a resolution, if possible, to provoke him to strike me first, and in such case, to belabour him to some purpose. The carpenter was got into a tree, and Bilby stood below to secure the branches as they fell; but I forced them from him, and upon his asking the reason, told him the trees were my property, that I had bought and paid for them to such a one; he replying that he was a rogue, I readily acknowledged that he might very well be called so, with respect to honest men, but with regard to a bailiff, and especially to so vile a cannibal as he was, the man ought to be allowed honest. Bilby, irritated at the compliment, endeavoured to wrest the branch I had taken, out of my hand, and finding he struggled in vain, he gave me a blow. I never received one before with pleasure; but I own the stroke afforded me a particular satisfaction, as it gave me an opportunity to pommel the rascal with impunity, and I did not let it slip; for I flew at him and beat him unmercifully, as I was greatly superior to him in strength. The carpenter, seeing his comrade so roughly handled, came down to his assistance, and, endeavouring to take me off him, tore my headclothes, which was directly quenching fire with oil; for I left the bailiff, who took that opportunity to make a precipitate retreat, and leave us to fight it out. I, having seized the carpenter, struck up his heels, and falling upon him with my knee in his stomach, I let him rise, but it was to knock him down again, which I did till I was quite spent with thrashing him and forced to give over, though much later than the poor fellow could have wished; for he often endeavoured to get clear of me, and follow the example of his principal, which he did as soon as he could, and showed he had better heels than hands.

About this time there was a camp in Hyde Park, where I kept a sutler's tent; Lord Cadogan, when the King came to review the forces, treated his majesty and the prince, with a great many of the nobility, and was so good as to send for me to stand sentinel at the tent door; but to my misfortune, having nobody I could trust with my business, my husband being to perform exercise in the foot guards, I could not do that duty. However, I resolved at all events to see the King; but finding several general officers in a tent joining to that in which his majesty dined, I stepped into them without design of staying; but they plied me so well with strong-bodied wines, that I had almost forgot what I went upon; they gave me a shilling a-piece for a kiss, which I gave them, and went to see the King: but I had delayed too long, his majesty was going into his coach when I came up; however, I got so near that he perceived me, and with great humanity said, he thought to have seen the old dragoon sooner. I prayed God to go with his majesty, and he drove off, leaving me disappointed in my expectations. I went to take a view of the pavilion which was formerly taken by Prince Eugene from the Grand Vizier in Hungary, and certainly the richest I ever saw. While I was looking upon this magnificent piece of work, I remembered that the nobility who attended on his majesty and the prince, were entertained in an adjoining tent; I immediately went thither, and was admitted. I acquainted them that I had lost several pounds in the camp, by scoring their followers, and hoped they would take it into consideration. On this one proposed contributing a guinea a-piece, which was so great and seasonable a relief, that without it I must either have perished, or gone upon the parish; for the fatigue of cooking, and the effect which the loss of the money I trusted in the camp, had on my mind, threw me into a tertian ague, which compelled me to leave the camp the following day. As to any assistance from my husband, it would have been the highest of folly to have expected it, as he always spent more than he got; nay, so inconsiderate was he, that the day after I left the camp, he sold my tent and everything in it for forty shillings, though the tent alone cost me fifty; and, notwithstanding the condition I was in, spent every penny of the money.

While I was lain up with the ague, I heard the news of the Duke of Marlborough's death; which additional trouble, for I was greatly indebted to his grace's goodness, both abroad and at home, increased my illness, and even to this day affects me; he had been my colonel, general, and benefactor, and the remembrance of what I owe to his humanity, will make me lament his death to the day of my own. I was, at the time of his funeral, well enough to go abroad, though very weak; however, I went to the late duke's house, and, placing myself by my husband, marched in the funeral procession, with a heavy heart and streaming eyes. When the ceremony was over, I left the regiment in the camp, and returned to my house.

When I was thoroughly recovered, unwilling to be troubled with my landlord, Mr. S——y, and his new tenant the bailiff, I settled at Windsor: the former of these, being overwhelmed with debt, and threatened with a goal, put an end to the menaces of his creditors and his own life by cutting the veins of his wrist; the latter met with a just reward of his rogueries.

I lived a private life in my new settlement, supported by the benevolence of the nobility and gentry to whom I had the honour of being known; and which was much more considerable than at present, as many of my benefactors are dead, as some imagining that what they gave me was extravagantly thrown away, and others, that I got considerably elsewhere, have either curtailed, or quite withdrawn their former charity; so that, at this day, I have not one-third of the benefactors I then had.

Having spent a whole year at Windsor, I grew tired of so inactive a life, and resolved to get once more into business. I removed to Paddington, took a public house, and by my diligence, and complaisance to my customers, had their number daily increase. Here, as elsewhere, I continued my visits to such as honoured me with their protection, and to whose generous contributions I was indebted for greater part of my support ever since my arrival from Flanders.

Among the rest of my benefactors, there was a noble lady who made me several presents, and one day gave me a hoop petticoat, a machine I knew not how to manage; and no wonder, for I never had one on before, and I believe it requires as much dexterity to exercise as a musket; however I was resolved, since it came at such an easy rate, to show away in it, and accordingly, wanting something of a brazier, I put on my hoop, which made me fancy myself in a go-cart, used for children when they begin first to feel their legs. I could not help laughing at the figure I made: but my finery, which at my setting out was the subject of my mirth, occasioned me, before I returned, both pain and confusion. In Knave's-acre, the footpath being narrow, I thrust against a post, which made the other side of my hoop fly up. I, who had never been hooped before, imagined it was some rude fellow thrusting his hands up my coats, and thinking slyly to revenge the insult, threw my stick back without looking behind me and gave my left hand, I carried on my wound which has been always open, such a blow, that I could not help crying out. I turned about, but could see nobody but some apprentices, who came about me at my roaring, and set up a loud laughter at the awkward management of my hoop, which I heartily cursed, with its inventor, and made off, vexed and ashamed at becoming the sport of boys.

Soon after this, I was sent for by some men of quality, and gentlemen of distinction, who, for their diversion, had invited Sir James Baker, called by them Lord Lateran, to the Thatched House to dinner; to which, however, they sat down without his lordship, and despatched in a hurry, and ordering a couple of ducks, some beefsteaks, and soup, to be set by for him, went into another room, whither I was conducted, and taught my cue.

This Lord Lateran was a person with whose simplicity several of the quality diverted themselves; he was by some esteemed a fool, others thought him mad, and others again believed he wore a mask, and rather suffered himself to be laughed at and made the jest of the company, than go without a dinner; which must have been the case, had he wanted the sense to conceal that, he could not but have, of the tricks put upon him.

Soon after the quality with whom the mock lord was to have dined were withdrawn, as I have said, his lordship came in, and resented their not staying for him, as the highest indignity offered to a man of his quality. The drawer endeavoured to appease him by a detail of what was set by for his lordship. Hearing there was soup, of which he was a great lover, and an immoderate eater, he was somewhat pacified, ordered it in, and fell to, very heartily, a waiter attending his lordship's further orders. I, by the time he was seated, went up and knocked at the door; the servant, who had his instructions, opened it, and asked my business; I asked if Sir James Baker was there. Madam, said the waiter, I know no such person, here is nobody here but my Lord Lateran. In the interim, the devisers of this plot on the poor lord, slipped in, and concealed themselves behind a screen that was between him and the door.

The fellow naming Lord Lateran, I answered, he was the very person after whom I inquired; went abruptly into the room, and seated myself opposite to him. His lordship seemed both confused and nettled at this freedom; he stared at me, and when he had recovered his surprise, asked what my business was, whence I came, and who sent me thither, desiring I would be expeditious, as he was but just set down to dinner. My dear, said I, I do not design to interrupt you in your meal, as I came on purpose to dine with you, though this pretended ignorance of me causes both my grief and astonishment, since you cannot but know that I had more regard to your solicitations than to my interest, having entirely disoblged all my friends by becoming your wife.—Wife! Wife! replied my lord in amaze, Why woman I never was married!—Is it possible, my lord, a man of your quality and good sense can bring a blemish on his honour, by denying what he is conscious can be so easily proved? It is happy for me and my two babies, as like you as one pea to another, that I have three witnesses of our marriage, or I find you would ruin my character and bastardize your poor innocent children—Children too! very fine truly, I have a wife and two children without knowing anything of the matter!—Lookye, my lord, I am not a woman to be trifled with; your simple denial will avail you nothing against the oaths of three credible, nay, creditable witnesses, though it has given me such a contempt for your person, that I can part with you and not break my heart ; but I expect you will, and that immediately, furnish me money for my and your children's support.—Why, thou thoroughpaced imposter! thou notorious abominable liar!—Go on, my lord ; money I must and will have ; this mean foul language is a scandal to your quality, but does not affect me or make me less your wife.—So I find you will swear I am married, to extort money out of me.—His lordship then turning to the drawer, who, though an actor in the farce, kept his countenance, which was naturally austere, desired he would do him the favour to hand that gentlewoman down stairs, and set his foot in her b——h. The fellow, prompted from behind the screen, answered, that he durst not part man and wife, as he did not know how dangerous it might be with regard to the law, extremely severe in such cases. My lord, in a fright, asked him if he thought I was really his wife ; As God is my judge, said he, I never was married to her. I cannot tell that, replied the other ; She avers, and you deny it ; she has witnesses to prove it upon oath, and you cannot prove a negative, let her evidence appear. There is no occasion for that, replied his lordship ; this is some abandoned battered old jade, who can no longer get money by whoring, and would now extort it by swearing a sham marriage upon me : I don't question her being prepared with false witnesses. Come, my dear lord, said I, fall to your soup, and after dinner, I will show your ingratitude by giving incontestible proof of our marriage. As his lordship was pretty sharp set, he took my advice, and fell too very heartily, protesting it was the best soup he had ever eat, only a little too salt. He had reason to say so, for the wag of a cook had pissed in it, and for that reason had bid me eat none. When his lordship had finished the soup, I bid the waiter bring me a plate, a knife, and a fork. Why sure, said my lord, you don't intend to dine with me ?—Indeed but I do, and bed with you too. Do you think I married to have only the bare name of a wife ?—Prithee woman, be quiet ; if you want a dinner, stay till I have done, or get to the sideboard. Was there ever such a vile impudent woman ?—Was there ever such an unkind husband ? But, my dear, you can't be in earnest, this is only to try my patience !—I protest, if I had my sword here, I would run you through the body. He spoke this with such emotion, that he set our audience upon the titter, and had like to have discovered all. The steaks and ducks being set upon the table, I desired he would help me ; but he was now grown sullen, and I could not wrest a word from him ; wherefore, without ceremony, I helped myself, where I best liked. Having dined, I told him I would now take my leave in hopes of finding him in better temper another time, but I entreated one kiss at parting. No, no, woman, I kiss you? Kiss the devil's dam. I will have a kiss before I go. Saying this, I got up, and made towards him ; he endeavoured to avoid me, and I chased him round the room before I could fasten upon him, and when I did, I held him fast round the neck and kissed him in spite of his resistance ; this threw him into such a passion that he would have run out of the room, and infallibly have seen the company behind the screen, but I got hold of him and gave them an opportunity to get off. When I thought they were got off clear, I let my lord go, who made the best of his way down stairs : when at the bottom, he threatened the master of the house that he would ruin him, for suffering such an insolent jade to affront a man of his quality.

The company who set me to play this roll, were highly diverted with the performance on all hands ; but, for my part, I can't but believe the mock lord smelt a rat, and was as little angry as I was fond. My reasons are, he eat heartily ; could not but hear those behind the screen titter, and also hear them go out of the room ; but it was his interest not to discover them. In short, they laughed at my lord, and my lord, if the truth was known, laughed at them. However, if I guess right, he carried on the jest, by industriously avoiding me if by chance he at any time saw me in the streets.

While I lived at Paddington, I applied myself to some friends, who at my request got my husband's discharge from the foot-guards ; but in this I wanted foresight, for he falling into his former extravagances, was so far from being of service to me in my business, as I had hoped he would, that I was obliged to throw up my house and shop, sell off my goods, and procure a pass from Lord C——t for Ireland. When I came from that nobleman's house, where I had been for the above purpose, I passed by that of Lord S——x. Two of his footmen who were at the door, stopped me, and the gentleman ran to tell his lord that I was below. Upon the gentleman's returning, he told me that his lord wanted me to tease Sir James Baker, who with a great deal of company, was at table with his lordship. I was very glad of the opportunity, and followed the gentleman up stairs, who, pointing to a room, and making signs for me to go in, I rapped gently at the door, and somebody called out, Come in. I obeyed the order; several of the company, strangers to me and the story of the Thatched House, were, at my entrance, pretty much surprised; but more so, when they saw Lord S—x smile upon me. I put on a seeming confusion, and begged pardon for being so unmannerly as to intrude into a strange company in a nobleman's house, but hoped they would think me rather an object of their compassion than resentment, when they knew that it was the unkindness of a husband, for whom I had the tenderest affection, forced me to take a step, which I was sensible could hardly be excused by any other motive. My lord, said I, my name is Baker, and as I heard Sir James Baker is in this company, I have taken the liberty to inquire after my husband. Madam, replied my lord, there is no such person here, possibly you mean Lord Lateran; if it is that noble lord you seek, you have not lost your labour, he is at table. The moment Sir James heard me name him, he turned his head, and spying me, in a violent, if not a feigned passion, vented himself in these or the like words; Thou wicked, vile, base, infamous woman, why dost thus haunt me? How! said my Lord S—x, by this language she cannot be your lady, for Lord Lateran has too much honour to treat a wife with such harsh language. Then turning to me, as if I was entirely unknown to him, he continued; Woman, look to what you are about, men of quality are not to be insulted with impunity; you must not think to impose on that noble lord; you call yourself his wife, if you do not prove it, I have a good pump in my yard to revenge the insult on that noble person, and may perhaps cure you of your vile practice. I desired his lordship not to judge partially or rashly, but that he would give me leave to speak. His lordship said it was just and reasonable to hear what I could offer. My lords, said I, my simple assertion, I am sensible, would little avail me; but I have living witnesses of the truth of what I have advanced; witnesses my lord, who were present when the priest performed the ceremony of our marriage, besides two sons, the fruits of it, enregistered in his name, and long acknowledged his children by himself. It is true that ten years since he left me, without any just matter of complaint against me; for I defy the world, censorious as it is, to cast the least reflection on my honour; my enemies allow me a woman of insuperable virtue. Oh! the vile strumpet, cried Sir James. Let her proceed, said Lord S——x, she speaks with an air of truth, and your passion makes me fear there is some jealousy at the bottom of this affair. Z——ds, said Sir James, your lordship can't believe that infamous wretch; upon my honour I never saw her but once before, except in the streets, and then she pinned herself upon me at the Thatched House. Let her go on, replied Lord S——x. Continued I, I am to this day ignorant of the reason why he left me, which, I must own, greatly afflicted me; for he was a very fond husband for the space of three years that we lived happily together. Not three minutes, my lord, on my honour, cried Sir James; the Devil must have spirited up this incubus to persecute me. I went on; Your lordship cannot suppose that I have my witnesses always with me, wherefore, my lord, I put it upon this issue for the present, let him take his oath that I am not his wife; he dares not do it. Lord S——x said that would be descending below his dignity. Well, my lord, since he is now a man of quality, I am loath to expose him in a public court, and am ready to forget what is passed, if he will return with me to his own house. My dear Lord Lateran, you know how you have wronged me, but I will never mention the injury, all shall be buried in oblivion, and will seal this promise with a virtuous kiss. I was going round to him, and he seeing no way to avoid me, leaped over the table, threw down some chairs, broke a few glasses, threw open the door, ran down stairs, threatening to kill the man who would stop him, and swore he would never more enter that house. In the streets he had all the actions of a madman, lifting his hands to heaven, doubling his fists, stamping; and as a footman who followed him, reported, threatening me with death. When the laugh was over, which made some of the company hold their sides, and others wipe their eyes, Lord S——x ordered me to sit down, take a glass, and give the company my story; I obeyed his lordship, and was as succinct as possible. When I had finished my history, every one at the table made me a present of five shillings, and my lord S——x bid me take a bottle of wine home with me.

Soon after this, having made money of my goods, I left Paddington, and went to Charles-street, Westminster. Here having an order from the Governors of Chelsea College to appear at the Board, as all do, at a certain time, who receive pensions as invalids, I went and made my appearance. In returning home through the Five-fields, I fell in with two pensioners, who had been on the same errand; one of them, who was an intimate acquaintance, stopped me to inquire after my health. His companion took an opportunity, from the difference of our pensions to abuse me, as undeserving that I enjoyed, having never done anything for the government. Nettled at this treatment, I made a comparison between his and my service, greatly to my own advantage, and concluded with calling him a faggot and a cowardly dog. Stung with this appellation, he was resolved to show his bravery, for he drew, and made a thrust at me, who had no other weapon than my stick, with which I put by his pass, closed in with him, wrenched the sword out of his hand, threw it over the bank, fell upon him with my oaken plant, broke his head in two places, and belaboured him till he cried Peccavi. Two gentlemen, spectators of the fray, offered me a ten shilling treat, but my business would not let me accept it.

I now waited about the court that I might be in the way of my benefactors, and often received their benevolence, which enabled me to return to and settle in my native country. I took a house as near as possible to the castle, as I had great dependence on the Lord-lieutenant, Lord C——t's family, and, indeed, his lordship's servants were the best customers I had, as my lord himself was my best friend, often giving me money to pay my rent, beside a privilege he allowed me exclusive of all others to sell beer in the Deer Park on a review day; but, as there was a greater call for liquor than I could furnish, I gave a license to two others.

I stayed but one year in Ireland, which was as much owing to my inclination to rambling as to my business not answering my expectation; but while I was in Dublin, I happened one day to espy the Rev. Mr. Howell, who, as I have before shown, robbed me of my maiden treasure; he also had a sight of, and endeavoured to speak to me: I avoided him, and by turning into a coffee-house, eluded his design. He was now married, the father of eleven children, and settled in Shropshire, where my husband at this time was. He, finding that I carefully avoided giving him an opportunity to converse with me, went home to his brother's, where he lodged while in Dublin, and appeared very melancholy; every one inquired into the cause of his visible alteration; but his sister alone could extort the secret from him. He told her that he had seen me, which brought fresh to his memory the injury he had done me, and the perjury he had been guilty of; that a reflection upon his injustice was intolerable, and gave him such pain, that he believed he should never recover his peace of mind. His sister would have sent for me, but he would not suffer her; For, said he, I am sure she will not come, her resentment of the wrong I have done her is too strong. The next day he left Dublin, and about seven weeks after, his sister meeting me, read a letter, which gave her the melancholy account of his having destroyed himself. Change of kingdoms had made no change in his temper; his sadness daily increased, and he could find no ease, wherefore he resolved to put an end to his life, which was a torture to him: to this end, he one day rose very early, and went into his study; his wife, at her usual hour, got up, and preparing his breakfast, sent one of the children to give him notice that it was ready: the child, after having knocked several times at the door without any one answering, opened the door, found him hanging in his sash, and quite dead. At this sight, the child screeched out, and fell into a swoon. The child's scream alarmed her mother, who, running up with some others of her children, saw the distracting sight; the poor woman was inconsolable, for she not only lost a husband she loved, but saw herself by that loss deprived of bread, with eleven children to maintain. Mr. Howell, some little time before he was guilty of this rash action, wrote a letter to his brother, in which he tells him, that the reflection on the injury he had done me, had robbed him of all peace of mind, and brought upon him such a settled melancholy, that he was in a state of despair, and bid him not to be surprised if he should hear that he had lain violent hands upon himself.

When I had resolved upon quitting Dublin, I sent a letter to my husband to take a house for me at Chester. Soon after he sent me an answer, and let me know he had taken a very convenient one for me in that town, and desired me to make all possible haste to get thither. On the receipt of this, I went to take my leave of Lord C——t, who, to divert himself, would needs see the ceremony of a camp marriage, so led Colonel P——t and me into the garden, where, laying two swords across, the colonel first and I next, jumped over them, his lordship performing the function of the priest, pronouncing the following words, Jump Rogue,—Follow Whore. After the ceremony was over, my lord gave us a treat, and dismissing me. I went on board the yacht.

I met Colonel M——y and several land officers who were going to England in the same vessel. They asked if I had a pass, and I showed it them; but the captain of the yacht (whose surly temper and behaviour, and turning several poor people ashore who could not pay their passage, gave me a distaste) coming to me in a gruff manner, said, D——ye, where's your pass? I answered him in as rough a style, and refused to let him see it. On this, he threatened to send me back, and I threatened to beat him, which was no small diversion to the officers, who egged me on to box him, but the captain had more wit. When we arrived at Chester, I showed him my pass, and, at the same time told him, I would acquaint his majesty that he stole milliners' apprentices and made a bawdy-house of the king's vessel, which was true enough.

I lived three years in Chester, and then returned to Chelsea, where I have remained ever since, without anything happening worth notice. I got my husband into the College, where he is a sergeant, and have been hitherto subsisted by the benevolence of the quality and gentry of the court, whither I go twice a week; but the expense of coach hire, as both my lameness and age increase, for I cannot walk ten yards without help, is a terrible tax upon their charity, and at the same time, many of my friends going no longer to court, my former subsistence is greatly diminished from what it was.
